CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE FORTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.

THIRD SESSION.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 2, 1878.

The first Monday of December being the day prescribed by the Constitution of the United States for the annual meeting of Congress, the third session of the Forty-fifth Congress commenced this day.

The Senators assembled in the Senate Chamber at the Capitol, in the city of Washington.

The VICE-PRESIDENT of the United States (Hon. WILLIAM A. WHEELER, of New York) took the chair and called the Senate to order at twelve o'clock noon.

SENATORS PRESENT.

PRAYER.

Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate, offered the following prayer:

Almighty and Everlasting God, suffer us to come before Thee at this time in worship and adoration! Great and marvelous are Thy ways; when, out of fever and funeral, Thou hast set up the marriage of the nation, when over the heavy summer months Thou hast breathed the beauty of a martyr endurance and a noble magnanimity! The billows of a dark providence have gone over us; but out of the sea of human sorrow Thou hast bidden forth the angel forms of human sympathy and generosity, so that the spirit of a great brotherhood has risen to walk upon the waves even as the feet of Him who once rescued his perishing apostle. God be praised that He alone is able to bridge the gulf between the subtle chemistry of nature and the still more subtle conscience of the human soul. God be praised that He alone is able to cause this scene of our earthly desolation to blossom with the flowering and fragrant hope of a blessed immortality.

Bless, we beseech Thee, Thy servants, the President and Vice-President of the United States and all our rulers, law-givers, governors, and executives, and all the people of the land. Bless, we beseech Thee, the Congress this day assembled; and as Thou hast preserved the lives of all these, Thy servants, and hast brought them in safety to this high field of labor, we pray Thee endow them with abundant strength and wisdom for the responsibility and task before them. And be favorable unto our nation. Grant that nothing may impede its onward march in probity, in courage, in all true greatness, that we may be a people to Thy praise in all generations. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

NOTIFICATION TO THE HOUSE.

Mr. ANTHONY offered the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two members be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the committee on the part of the Senate; and Messrs. ANTHONY and BAYARD were appointed.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the hour of the daily meeting of the Senate be twelve o'clock meridian, until otherwise ordered.

PROPOSED TRANSFER OF INDIAN BUREAU.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Public Printer is hereby authorized and directed to print the testimony taken and to be taken, the reports of the committee, and the accompanying documents, of the joint committee to consider the feasibility of transferring the Indian Bureau to the War Department.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska desire immediate action upon the resolution?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I should like to have it considered now because the Printer must have authority from the Senate before he can print the testimony.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there unanimous consent that the resolution be now considered?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Unless there is a pressing necessity for immediate printing, the resolution had better take the usual course and go to the Committee on Printing, when appointed.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will state in one word that the only necessity for immediate printing is that the amount of testimony is large, and as some members of the committee were not present when it was taken they are anxious to see it, and if it is not printed at once the committee probably cannot make a report as early as they otherwise could.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the rule the resolution will go to the Committee on Printing, when appointed.

PREVENTION OF EPIDEMIC DISEASES.

Mr. HARRIS. I offer the following resolution, and I desire to give notice that I shall ask the Senate to consider it to-morrow:

Whereas the epidemic which has recently prevailed in large districts of several of the States of the Union has been so destructive to human life and the interests and prosperity of the whole country as to make it a subject of gravest public concern, and its prevention in future an important duty, to the end that its return may be prevented, so far as prompt and decided action can prevent:

Be it resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That a joint select committee of four Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and five Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House, be appointed to investigate and report the best means of preventing the introduction and spread of epidemic diseases, especially yellow fever and cholera, within the limits of the United States; that said committee be allowed a clerk and, if in the course of its investigations it is found necessary, a stenographer; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to employ experts and scientists, not to exceed seven in number, and send them to, and by subcommittee visit, recently infected localities, for the purpose of obtaining the fullest and most accurate information; and that said committee may report at any time during the present session of Congress, by bill or otherwise.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table, subject to the call of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And let it be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be printed, under the rule.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. President, I had intended to offer a resolution of the same character, and in order that they may be printed together I now submit it.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That a commission is hereby authorized and constituted, to consist of three Senators, to be appointed by the Senate, three members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker, and experts not exceeding seven in number, to be selected by and associated with them, with authority to determine the time and place of meeting, to employ stenographers and clerks, and to take testimony, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the history and the means of prevention and arrest of yellow fever, and to report the facts and their opinions and recommendations at any time.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution on the same subject:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House concurring,) That a joint committee composed of five members of the Senate and five members of the House of Representatives be appointed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the causes and circumstances of the late yellow-fever epidemic, and to report what legislation, if any, should be enacted by Congress to prevent a recurrence of the same; that said joint committee be authorized to send for persons and papers and employ stenographers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This resolution will also be printed and laid on the table.

THE TRADE-DOLLAR.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer, Mr. President, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of making the trade-dollar authorized by section 15 of the act of Congress approved February, 1873, a legal tender for all debts, public and private, and providing for its recoinage into the standard dollar of 412½ grains.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over under the rule.

EXERCISE OF ELECTIVE FRANCHISE.

Mr. BLAINE submitted the following resolutions; which were read:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire and report to the Senate whether at the recent elections the constitutional rights of American citizens were violated in any of the States of the Union; whether the right of suffrage of citizens of the United States, or of any class of such citizens, was denied or abridged by the action of the election officers of any State in refusing to receive their votes, in failing to count them, or in receiving and counting fraudulent ballots in pursuance of a conspiracy to make the lawful votes of such citizens of none effect; and whether such citizens were prevented from exercising the elective franchise, or forced to use it against their wishes, by violence or threats, or hostile demonstrations of armed men or other organizations, or by any other unlawful means or practices.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be further instructed to inquire and report whether it is within the competency of Congress to provide by additional legislation for the more perfect security of the right of suffrage to citizens of the United States in all the States of the Union.

Resolved, That in prosecuting these inquiries the Committee on the Judiciary shall have the right to send for persons and papers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine desire action on the resolutions at this time?

Mr. BLAINE. I have no personal preference.

Mr. THURMAN. Let them go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will go over under the rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They ought to be printed. I move that an order be made to print them for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

CREDENTIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented the credentials of JUSTIN S. MORRILL, chosen by the Legislature of Vermont a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1879; which were read and ordered to be filed.

SURVEYS OF TERRITORIES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter of O. C. Marsh, vice-president and acting president of the National Academy of Sciences, held in New York, November 6, 1878, submitting the report on the scientific surveys of the Territories made by the National Academy of Sciences in accordance with the requirement of law contained in the act "making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1878; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed, to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, when appointed.

REPORT OF SECRETARY OF SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the annual report of the Secretary of the Senate, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement of the receipts and expenditures of the Senate from July 1, 1877, to June 30, 1878, and a statement of property in his possession belonging to the United States December 2, 1878; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

REPORT OF SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the annual report of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement of property in his possession belonging to the United States December 2, 1878; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

COURT OF CLAIMS REPORT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the report of the clerk of the Court of Claims, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement of judgments rendered by that court for the year ending December 2, 1878; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORRILL presented the petition of Anson Dart, praying compensation for services performed in the Indian service, in the Territory of Oregon, in 1850; which was ordered to lie on the table, to be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, when appointed.

Mr. MORRILL. I also present a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Vermont, relating to the remonetization of silver, which I ask to have read and referred to the Committee on Finance, when appointed.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution relating to the remonetization of silver.

Whereas the Bland silver bill, passed at the last session of Congress, has not met the hopes of its friends in maintaining the value of silver bullion or inducing other nations to join this in remonetizing silver, as was confidently predicted by its friends; and

Whereas the fears of its opponents, wherein they predicted that the metal would constantly fluctuate in value and that the gold-standard nations would not join us in making a double standard of value, have proved true; and

Whereas the bullion value of our 412½ grain silver dollar has fallen from ninety-two and one-half cents at the time of the passage of the act to eighty-four and one-half cents at the present time; and

Whereas a legal-tender dollar, whose debt-paying power is 100 cents and whose purchasing value in the chief commercial markets of the world is only eighty-four and one-half cents, wars against exports and promotes imports: Therefore,

Resolved by the house of representatives, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are requested to use all honorable efforts to have the silver bill so modified as to lessen or prevent the evil effects sure to flow therefrom.

Resolved, That the commodities of this country are now based on gold values, and that if the silver bill is not modified a great inflation of values will in time take place, by free banking, based on a silver dollar of eighty-four and one-half cents as a legal-tender reserve, and that it would be a great wrong to thus inflate values and thereby necessitate another cruel shrinkage of values.

Resolved, That either the number of grains of silver in our dollar should be increased, so as to make it of equal value with the gold dollar, or, more preferable, that the amount of its coinage or its legal tender should be limited.

Resolved, That the governor be requested to forward to the United States Senate and House of Representatives, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, one copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions.

EBEN P. COLTON,
President of the Senate.
JAMES L. MARTIN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MORRILL also presented the petition of Caroline M. Lamb, of Vermont; the petition of George N. M. Bean, of Vermont, and the petition of Rose McNally, of Vermont, praying the passage of the House bill providing that all pensions shall commence at the date of the discharge or death of the soldiers for whom they are granted; which were ordered to lie on the table, to be referred to the Committee on Pensions, when appointed.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of Theophilus P. Chandler, late subtreasurer at Boston, Massachusetts, asking to be relieved from liability on account of fraudulent acts of a subordinate in which he was not at fault; which was ordered to lie on the table, to be referred to the Committee on Claims, when appointed.

He also presented the petition of W. H. Dunbar, of Massachusetts, and the petition of Peter Bushier, of Massachusetts, praying the passage of the House bill providing that all pensions shall commence at the date of the discharge or death of the soldiers for whom they are granted; which were ordered to lie on the table, to be referred to the Committee on Pensions, when appointed.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented the petition of Henry R. Rathbone, late major Fifth United States Infantry, praying the passage of a law providing that his name may be placed on the retired list of the Army; which was ordered to lie on the table, to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, when appointed.

Mr. THURMAN presented the memorial of Mary Hopperton, widow of Edward Hopperton, deceased, late a wheelwright in the Quartermaster's Department, United States Army, praying the passage of a law authorizing the payment to her of a pension at the rate of $8 per month from the date of the death of her husband; which was ordered to lie on the table, to be referred to the Committee on Pensions, when appointed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McDONALD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1414) granting a pension to James H. Woodard; which was read twice by its title and ordered to lie on the table, to be referred to the Committee on Pensions, when appointed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1415) for the relief of the bondsmen of the late Captain Richard Stevenson, assistant quartermaster; which was read twice by its title and ordered to lie on the table, to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, when appointed.

Mr. BECK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1416) to provide for retiring the trade-dollar and for its recoinage into the standard silver dollar; which was read twice by its title and ordered to lie on the table, to be referred to the Committee on Finance, when appointed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1417) amendatory of title 48 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, so as to authorize the purchase of foreign-built ships by citizens of the United States; which was read twice by its title and ordered to lie on the table, to be referred to the Committee on Commerce, when appointed.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1418) for the relief of H. R. Rathbone; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table, to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, when appointed.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1419) granting a pension to Mrs. Rosa Gale; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table, to be referred to the Committee on Pensions, when appointed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. McDONALD, it was Ordered, That the papers in the matter of James H. Woodard be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

At twelve o'clock and fifty minutes p. m. Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, the Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared at the bar of the Senate and delivered the following message:

Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled, and that the House is now ready to proceed to business.

The House of Representatives has appointed Mr. JOHN D. C. ATKINS of Tennessee, Mr. SAMUEL S. COX of New York, and Mr. JAMES A. GARFIELD of Ohio, a committee on the part of the House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

RECESS.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate take a recess for three-quarters of an hour.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate accordingly took a recess till one o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m., when the Vice President resumed the chair.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, the joint committee appointed by the two Houses of Congress to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that they were organized for the dispatch of business and were ready to receive any communication which it might be his pleasure to make to them, have performed the duty assigned them, and the President replied that he would communicate with the two Houses immediately in writing.

At one o'clock and thirty-eight minutes p. m. Mr. W. K. RODGERS, the Private Secretary of the President of the United States, appeared at the bar of the Senate, and said:

Mr. President: I am directed by the President of the United States to deliver to the Senate a message in writing.

The message was received from the Secretary and handed to the Vice-President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the annual message of the President of the United States, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary of the Senate, Mr. GEORGE C. GORHAM, read the message, as follows:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

Our heartfelt gratitude is due to the Divine Being, who holds in His hands the destinies of nations, for the continued bestowal, during the last year, of countless blessings upon our country.

We are at peace with all other nations. Our public credit has greatly improved, and is, perhaps, now stronger than ever before. Abundant harvests have rewarded the labors of those who till the soil, our manufacturing industries are reviving, and it is believed that general prosperity, which has been so long anxiously looked for, is at last within our reach.

The enjoyment of health by our people generally has, however, been interrupted, during the past season, by the prevalence of a fatal pestilence, the yellow fever, in some portions of the Southern States, creating an emergency which called for prompt and extraordinary measures of relief. The disease appeared as an epidemic at New Orleans and at other places on the Lower Mississippi soon after midsummer. It was rapidly spread by fugitives from the infected cities and towns, and did not disappear until early in November. The States of Louisiana, Mississippi, and Tennessee have suffered severely. About one hundred thousand cases are believed to have occurred, of which about twenty thousand, according to intelligent estimates, proved fatal. It is impossible to estimate with any approach to accuracy the loss to the country occasioned by this epidemic. It is to be reckoned by the hundred millions of dollars. The suffering and destitution that resulted excited the deepest sympathy in all parts of the Union. Physicians and nurses hastened from every quarter to the assistance of the afflicted communities. Voluntary contributions of money and supplies, in every needed form, were speedily and generously furnished. The Government was able to respond in some measure to the call for help by providing tents, medicines, and food for the sick and destitute, the requisite direction for the purpose being given in the confident expectation that this action of the Executive would receive the sanction of Congress. About eighteen hundred tents, and rations of the value of about $25,000, were sent to cities and towns which applied for them, full details of which will be furnished to Congress by the proper Department.

The fearful spread of this pestilence has awakened a very general public sentiment in favor of national sanitary administration, which shall not only control quarantine, but have the sanitary supervision of internal commerce in times of epidemics and hold an advisory relation to the state and municipal health authorities, with power to deal with whatever endangers the public health and which the municipal and state authorities are unable to regulate. The national quarantine act, approved April 29, 1878, which was passed too late in the last session of Congress to provide the means for carrying it into practical operation during the past season, is a step in the direction here indicated. In view of the necessity for the most effective measures, by quarantine and otherwise, for the protection of our seaports and the country generally from this and other epidemics, it is recommended that Congress give to the whole subject early and careful consideration.

The permanent pacification of the country by the complete protection of all citizens in every civil and political right continues to be of paramount interest with the great body of our people. Every step in this direction is welcomed with public approval, and every interruption of steady and uniform progress to the desired consummation awakens general uneasiness and widespread condemnation. The recent congressional elections have furnished a direct and trustworthy test of the advance thus far made in the practical establishment of the right of suffrage secured by the Constitution to the liberated race in the southern States. All disturbing influences, real or imaginary, had been removed from all of these States.

The three constitutional amendments which conferred freedom and equality of civil and political rights upon the colored people of the South were adopted, by the concurrent action of the great body of good citizens who maintained the authority of the National Government and the integrity and perpetuity of the Union at such a cost of treasure and life, as a wise and necessary embodiment in the organic law of the just results of the war. The people of the former slaveholding States accepted these results, and gave, in every practicable form, assurances that the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments, and laws passed in pursuance thereof, should, in good faith, be enforced, rigidly and impartially, in letter and spirit, to the end that the humblest citizen, without distinction of race or color, should, under them, receive full and equal protection in person and property and in political rights and privileges. By these constitutional amendments the southern section of the Union obtained a large increase of political power in Congress and in the Electoral College, and the country justly expected that elections would proceed, as to the enfranchised race, upon the same circumstances of legal and constitutional freedom and protection which obtained in all the other States of the Union. The friends of law and order looked forward to the conduct of these elections, as offering to the general judgment of the country an important opportunity to measure the degree in which the right of suffrage could be exercised by the colored people and would be respected by their fellow-citizens; but a more general enjoyment of freedom of suffrage by the colored people, and a more just and generous protection of that freedom by the communities of which they form a part, were generally anticipated than the record of the elections discloses. In some of those States in which the colored people have been unable to make their opinions felt in the elections the result is mainly due to influences not easily measured or remedied by legal protection; but in the States of Louisiana and South Carolina at large, and in some particular congressional districts outside of those States, the records of the elections seem to compel the conclusion that the rights of the colored voters have been overridden, and their participation in the elections not permitted to be either general or free.

It will be for the Congress for which these elections were held to make such examinations into their conduct as may be appropriate to determine the validity of the claims of members to their seats. In the mean while it becomes the duty of the executive and judicial departments of the Government, each in its province, to inquire into and punish violations of the laws of the United States which have occurred. I can but repeat what I said in this connection in my last message, that whatever authority rests with me to this end I shall not hesitate to put forth, and I am unwilling to forego a renewed appeal to the Legislatures, the courts, the executive authorities, and the people of the States where these wrongs have been perpetrated, to give their assistance toward bringing to justice the offenders and preventing a repetition of the crimes. No means within my power will be spared to obtain a full and fair investigation of the alleged crimes and to secure the conviction and just punishment of the guilty.

It is to be observed that the principal appropriation made for the Department of Justice at the last session contained the following clause: "And for defraying the expenses which may be incurred in the enforcement of the act approved February 28, 1871, entitled 'An act to amend an act approved May 30, 1870, entitled "An act to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of the Union, and for other purposes,"' or any acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto." It is the opinion of the Attorney-General that the expenses of these proceedings will largely exceed the amount which was thus provided, and I rely confidently upon Congress to make adequate appropriations to enable the executive department to enforce the laws.

I respectfully urge upon your attention that the congressional elections in every district, in a very important sense, are justly a matter of political interest and concern throughout the whole country. Each State, every political party, is entitled to the share of power which is conferred by the legal and constitutional suffrage. It is the right of every citizen, possessing the qualifications prescribed by law, to cast one unintimidated ballot and to have his ballot honestly counted. So long as the exercise of this power and the enjoyment of this right are common and equal, practically as well as formally, submission to the results of the suffrage will be accorded loyally and cheerfully, and all the departments of government will feel the true vigor of the popular will thus expressed. No temporary or administrative interests of government, however urgent or weighty, will ever displace the zeal of our people in defense of the primary rights of citizenship. They understand that the protection of liberty requires the maintenance, in full vigor, of the manly methods of free speech, free press, and free suffrage, and will sustain the full authority of government to enforce the laws which are framed to preserve these inestimable rights. The material progress and welfare of the States depend on the protection afforded to their citizens. There can be no peace without such protection, no prosperity without peace, and the whole country is deeply interested in the growth and prosperity of all its parts.

While the country has not yet reached complete unity of feeling and reciprocal confidence between the communities so lately and so seriously estranged, I feel an absolute assurance that the tendencies are in that direction and with increasing force. The power of public opinion will override all political prejudices and all sectional or State attachments in demanding that all over our wide territory the name and character of citizen of the United States shall mean one and the same thing, and carry with them unchallenged security and respect.

Our relations with other countries continue peaceful. Our neutrality in contests between foreign Powers has been maintained and respected.

The universal exposition held at Paris during the past summer has been attended by large numbers of our citizens. The brief period allowed for the preparation and arrangement of the contributions of our citizens to this great exposition was well employed in energetic and judicious efforts to overcome this disadvantage. These efforts, led and directed by the commissioner-general, were remarkably successful, and the exhibition of the products of American industry was creditable and gratifying in scope and character. The reports of the United States commissioners, giving its results in detail, will be duly laid before you. Our participation in this international competition for the favor and the trade of the world may be expected to produce useful and important results in promoting intercourse, friendship, and commerce with other nations.

In accordance with the provisions of the act of February 28, 1878, three commissioners were appointed to an international conference on the subject of adopting a common ratio between gold and silver, for the purpose of establishing, internationally, the use of bimetallic money, and securing fixity of relative value between those metals. Invitations were addressed to the various governments which had expressed a willingness to participate in its deliberations. The conference held its meetings in Paris, in August last. The report of the commissioners, herewith submitted, will show its results. No common ratio between gold and silver could be agreed upon by the conference. The general conclusion was reached that it is necessary to maintain in the world the monetary functions of silver as well as of gold, leaving the selection of the use of one or the other of these two metals, or of both, to be made by each State.

Congress having appropriated at its last session the sum of $5,500,000 to pay the award of the joint commission at Halifax, if, after correspondence with the British government on the subject of the conformity of the award to the requirements of the treaty and to the terms of the question thereby submitted to the commission, the President shall deem it his duty to make the payment, communications upon these points were addressed to the British government through the legation of the United States at London. Failing to obtain the concurrence of the British government in the views of this Government respecting the award, I have deemed it my duty to tender the sum named, within the year fixed by the treaty, accompanied by a notice of the grounds of the payment, and a protest against any other construction of the same. The correspondence upon this subject will be laid before you.

The Spanish government has officially announced the termination of the insurrection in Cuba, and the restoration of peace throughout that island. Confident expectations are expressed of a revival of trade and prosperity, which it is earnestly hoped may prove well founded. Numerous claims of American citizens for relief for injuries or restoration of property have been among the incidents of the long-continued hostilities. Some of these claims are in process of adjustment by Spain, and the others are promised early and careful consideration.

The treaty made with Italy, in regard to reciprocal consular privileges, has been duly ratified and proclaimed.

No questions of grave importance have arisen with any other of the European powers

The Japanese government has been desirous of a revision of such parts of its treaties with foreign powers as relate to commerce, and, it is understood, has addressed to each of the treaty powers a request to open negotiations with that view. The United States Government has been inclined to regard the matter favorably. Whatever restrictions upon trade with Japan are found injurious to that people cannot but affect injuriously nations holding commercial intercourse with them. Japan, after a long period of seclusion, has within the past few years made rapid strides in the path of enlightenment and progress, and, not unreasonably, is looking forward to the time when her relations with the nations of Europe and America shall be assimilated to those which they hold with each other. A treaty looking to this end has been made, which will be submitted for the consideration of the Senate.

After an interval of several years the Chinese government has again sent envoys to the United States. They have been received, and a permanent legation is now established here by that government. It is not doubted that this step will be of advantage to both nations in promoting friendly relations and removing causes of difference.

The treaty with the Samoan Islands, having been duly ratified and accepted on the part of both governments, is now in operation, and a survey and soundings of the harbor of Pago-Pago have been made by a naval vessel of the United States, with a view of its occupation as a naval station, if found desirable to the service.

Since the resumption of diplomatic relations with Mexico correspondence has been opened and still continues between the two governments upon the various questions which at one time seemed to endanger their relations. While no formal agreement has been reached as to the troubles on the border, much has been done to repress and diminish them. The effective force of United States troops on the Rio Grande, by a strict and faithful compliance with instructions, has done much to remove the sources of dispute, and it is now understood that a like force of Mexican troops on the other side of the river is also making an energetic movement against the marauding Indian tribes. This Government looks with the greatest satisfaction upon every evidence of strength in the national authority of Mexico and upon every effort put forth to prevent or punish incursions upon our territory. Reluctant to assume any action or attitude in the control of these incursions by military movements across the border not imperatively demanded for the protection of the lives and property of our own citizens, I shall take the earliest opportunity, consistent with the proper discharge of this plain duty, to recognize the ability of the Mexican government to restrain effectively violations of our territory. It is proposed to hold next year an international exhibition in Mexico, and it is believed that the display of the agricultural and manufacturing products of the two nations will tend to better understanding and increased commercial intercourse between their people.

With Brazil, and the republics of Central and South America, some steps have been taken toward the development of closer commercial intercourse. Diplomatic relations have been resumed with Colombia and with Bolivia. A boundary question between the Argentine Republic and Paraguay has been submitted by those governments for arbitration to the President of the United States, and I have, after careful examination, given a decision upon it.

A naval expedition up the Amazon and Madeira Rivers has brought back information valuable both for scientific and commercial purposes. A like expedition is about visiting the coast of Africa and the Indian Ocean. The reports of diplomatic and consular officers in relation to the development of our foreign commerce have furnished many facts that have proved of public interest and have stimulated to practical exertion the enterprise of our people.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury furnishes a detailed statement of the operations of that Department of the Government, and of the condition of the public finances.

The ordinary revenues from all sources for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1878, were $257,763,878.70; the ordinary expenditures for the same period were $236,964,326.80—leaving a surplus revenue for the year of $20,799,551.90.

The receipts for the present fiscal year, ending June 30, 1879, actual and estimated, are as follows: Actual receipts for the first quarter, commencing July 1, 1878, $73,389,743.43; estimated receipts for the remaining three quarters of the year, $191,110,256.57; total receipts for the current fiscal year, actual and estimated, $264,500,000. The expenditures for the same period will be, actual and estimated, as follows: For the quarter commencing July 1, 1878, actual expenditures, $73,344,573.27; and for the remaining three quarters of the year the expenditures are estimated at $166,755,426.73—making the total expenditures $240,100,000; and leaving an estimated surplus revenue for the year ending June 30, 1879, of $24,400,000.

The total receipts during the next fiscal year, ending June 30, 1880, estimated according to existing laws, will be $264,500,000; and the estimated ordinary expenditures for the same period will be $236,320,412.68; leaving a surplus of $28,179,587.32 for that year.

In the foregoing statements of expenditures, actual and estimated, no amount is allowed for the sinking fund provided for by the act approved February 25, 1862, which requires that 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States shall be purchased or paid within each fiscal year, to be set apart as a sinking fund. There has been, however, a substantial compliance with the conditions of the laws. By its terms the public debt should have been reduced between 1862 and the close of the last fiscal year $518,361,806.28; the actual reduction of the ascertained debt in that period has been $720,644,739.61; being in excess of the reduction required by the sinking-fund act—$202,282,933.33.

The amount of the public debt, less cash in the Treasury, November 1, 1878, was $2,024,200,083.18—a reduction since the same date last year of $23,150,617.39.

The progress made during the last year in refunding the public debt at lower rates of interest is very gratifying. The amount of 4 per cent. bonds sold during the present year prior to November 23, 1878, is $100,270,900, and 6 per cent. bonds, commonly known as five-twenties, to an equal amount, have been or will be redeemed as calls mature.

It has been the policy of the Department to place the 4 per cent. bonds within easy reach of every citizen who desires to invest his savings, whether small or great, in these securities. The Secretary of the Treasury recommends that the law be so modified that small sums may be invested, and that through the post-offices, or other agents of the Government, the freest opportunity may be given in all parts of the country for such investments.

The best mode suggested is, that the Department be authorized to issue certificates of deposit, of the denomination of $10, bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum and convertible at any time within one year after their issue into the 4 per cent. bonds authorized by the refunding act, and to be issued only in exchange for United States notes sent to the Treasury by mail or otherwise. Such a provision of law, supported by suitable regulations, would enable any person readily, without cost or risk, to convert his money into an interest-bearing security of the United States, and the money so received could be applied to the redemption of 6 per cent. bonds.

The coinage of gold during the last fiscal year was $52,798,980. The coinage of silver dollars, under the act passed February 28, 1878, amounted on the 23d of November, 1878, to $19,814,550, of which amount $4,984,947 are in circulation, and the balance, $14,829,603, is still in the possession of the Government.

With views unchanged with regard to the act under which the coinage of silver proceeds, it has been the purpose of the Secretary faithfully to execute the law, and to afford a fair trial to the measure.

In the present financial condition of the country, I am persuaded that the welfare of legitimate business and industry of every description will be best promoted by abstaining from all attempts to make radical changes in the existing financial legislation. Let it be understood that during the coming year the business of the country will be undisturbed by governmental interference with the laws affecting it, and we may confidently expect that the resumption of specie payments, which will take place at the appointed time, will be successfully and easily maintained, and that it will be followed by a healthful and enduring revival of business prosperity. Let the healing influence of time, the inherent energies of our people, and the boundless resources of our country, have a fair opportunity, and relief from present difficulties will surely follow.

The report of the Secretary of War shows that the Army has been well and economically supplied, that our small force has been actively employed, and has faithfully performed all the service required of it. The morale of the Army has improved, and the number of desertions has materially decreased during the year.

The Secretary recommends—

1. That a pension be granted to the widow of the late Lieutenant Henry H. Benner, Eighteenth Infantry, who lost his life by yellow fever while in command of the steamer J. M. Chambers, sent with supplies for the relief of sufferers in the South from that disease.

2. The establishment of the annuity scheme for the benefit of the heirs of deceased officers, as suggested by the Paymaster-General.

3. The adoption by Congress of a plan for the publication of the records of the War of the Rebellion, now being prepared for that purpose.

4. The increase of the extra per diem of soldier-teachers employed in post-schools, and liberal appropriations for the erection of buildings for schools and libraries at the different posts.

5. The repeal or amendment of the act of June 18, 1878, forbidding the "use of the Army as a posse comitatus, or otherwise, for the purpose of executing the laws, except in such cases and under such circumstances as may be expressly authorized by the Constitution or by act of Congress."

6. The passage of a joint resolution of Congress legalizing the issues of rations, tents, and medicines which were made for the relief of sufferers from yellow fever.

7. That provision be made for the erection of a fire-proof building for the preservation of certain valuable records now constantly exposed to destruction by fire.

These recommendations are all commended to your favorable consideration.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy shows that the Navy has improved during the last fiscal year. Work has been done on seventy-five vessels, ten of which have been thoroughly repaired and made ready for sea. Two others are in rapid progress toward completion. The total expenditures of the year, including the amount appropriated for the deficiencies of the previous year, were $17,468,392.65. The actual expenses chargeable to the year, exclusive of these deficiencies, were $13,306,914.09, or $767,199.18 less than those of the previous year, and $4,928,677.74 less than the expenses including the deficiencies. The estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, are $14,562,381.45, exceeding the appropriations of the present year only $33,949.75, which excess is occasioned by the demands of the Naval Academy and the Marine Corps, as explained in the Secretary's report. The appropriations for the present fiscal year are $14,528,431.70, which, in the opinion of the Secretary, will be ample for all the current expenses of the Department during the year. The amount drawn from the Treasury from July 1 to November 1, 1878, is $4,740,544.14, of which, $70,980.75 has been refunded, leaving as the expenditure for that period $4,669,563.39, or $520,899.24 less than the corresponding period of the last fiscal year.

The report of the Postmaster-General embraces a detailed statement of the operations of the Post-Office Department. The expenditures of that Department for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1878, were $34,165,084.49. The receipts, including sales of stamps, money-order business, and official stamps, were $29,277,516.95. The sum of $290,436.90, included in the foregoing statement of expenditures, is chargeable to preceding years, so that the actual expenditures for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1878, are $33,874,647.50. The amount drawn from the Treasury on appropriations, in addition to the revenues of the Department, was $5,307,652.82. The expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, are estimated at $36,571,900 and the receipts from all sources at $30,664,023.90, leaving a deficiency to be appropriated out of the Treasury of $5,907,876.10. The report calls attention to the fact that the compensation of postmasters and of railroads for carrying the mails is regulated by law, and that the failure of Congress to appropriate the amounts required for these purposes does not relieve the Government of responsibility, but necessarily increases the deficiency bills which Congress will be called upon to pass.

In providing for the postal service the following questions are presented: Should Congress annually appropriate a sum for its expenses largely in excess of its revenues, or should such rates of postage be established as will make the Department self-sustaining? Should the postal service be reduced by excluding from the mails matter which does not pay its way? Should the number of post-routes be diminished? Should other methods be adopted which will increase the revenues or diminish the expenses of the postal service?

The international postal congress, which met at Paris, May 1, 1878, and continued in session until June 4 of the same year, was composed of delegates from nearly all the civilized countries of the world. It adopted a new convention, to take the place of the treaty concluded at Berne, October 9, 1874, which goes into effect on the 1st of April, 1879, between the countries whose delegates have signed it. It was ratified and approved, by and with the consent of the President, August 13, 1878. A synopsis of this universal postal convention will be found in the report of the Postmaster-General, and the full text in the appendix thereto. In its origin the postal union comprised twenty-three countries, having a population of three hundred and fifty millions of people. On the 1st of April next it will comprise forty-three countries and colonies, with a population of more than six hundred and fifty millions of people, and will soon, by the accession of the few remaining countries and colonies which maintain organized postal services, constitute, in fact as well as in name, as its new title indicates, a universal union, regulating, upon a uniform basis of cheap postage rates, the postal intercourse between all civilized nations.

Some embarrassment has arisen out of the conflict between the customs laws of this country and the provisions of the postal convention in regard to the transmission of foreign books and newspapers to this country by mail. It is hoped that Congress will be able to devise some means of reconciling the difficulties which have thus been created, so as to do justice to all parties involved.

The business of the Supreme Court, and of the courts in many of the circuits, has increased to such an extent during the past years that additional legislation is imperative to relieve and prevent the delay of justice, and possible oppression to suitors, which is thus occasioned. The encumbered condition of these dockets is presented anew in the report of the Attorney-General, and the remedy suggested is earnestly urged for congressional action. The creation of additional circuit judges, as proposed, would afford a complete remedy, and would involve an expense, at the present rate of salaries, of not more than $60,000 a year.

The annual reports of the Secretary of the Interior and of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs present an elaborate account of the present condition of the Indian tribes, and of that branch of the public service which ministers to their interests. While the conduct of the Indians generally has been orderly, and their relations with their neighbors friendly and peaceful, two local disturbances have occurred, which were deplorable in their character, but remained, happily, confined to a comparatively small number of Indians. The discontent among the Bannacks, which led first to some acts of violence on the part of some members of the tribe and finally to the outbreak, appears to have been caused by an insufficiency of food on the reservation, and this insufficiency to have been owing to the inadequacy of the appropriations made by Congress to the wants of the Indians at a time when the Indians were prevented from supplying the deficiency by hunting. After an arduous pursuit by the troops of the United States, and several engagements, the hostile Indians were reduced to subjection, and the larger part of them surrendered themselves as prisoners. In this connection I desire to call attention to the recommendation made by the Secretary of the Interior, that a sufficient fund be placed at the disposal of the Executive, to be used, with proper accountability, at discretion, in sudden emergencies of the Indian service.

The other case of disturbance was that of a band of Northern Cheyennes, who suddenly left their reservation in the Indian Territory and marched rapidly through the States of Kansas and Nebraska in the direction of their old hunting-grounds, committing murders and other crimes on their way. From documents accompanying the report of the Secretary of the Interior it appears that this disorderly band was as fully supplied with the necessaries of life as the forty-seven hundred other Indians who remained quietly on the reservation, and that the disturbance was caused by men of a restless and mischievous disposition among the Indians themselves. Almost the whole of this band have surrendered to the military authorities, and it is a gratifying fact that when some of them had taken refuge in the camp of the Red Cloud Sioux, with whom they had been in friendly relations, the Sioux held them as prisoners and readily gave them up to the officers of the United States, thus giving new proof of the loyal spirit which, alarming rumors to the contrary notwithstanding, they have uniformly shown ever since the wishes they expressed at the council of September, 1877, had been complied with.

Both the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of War unite in the recommendation that provision be made by Congress for the organization of a corps of mounted "Indian auxiliaries," to be under the control of the Army, and to be used for the purpose of keeping the Indians on their reservations and preventing or repressing disturbance on their part. I earnestly concur in this recommendation. It is believed that the organization of such a body of Indian cavalry, receiving a moderate pay from the Government, would considerably weaken the restless element among the Indians by withdrawing from it a number of young men and giving them congenial employment under the Government, it being a matter of experience that Indians in our service, almost without exception, are faithful in the performance of the duties assigned to them. Such an organization would materially aid the Army in the accomplishment of a task for which its numerical strength is sometimes found insufficient.

But while the employment of force for the prevention or repression of Indian troubles is of occasional necessity, and wise preparation should be made to that end, greater reliance must be placed on humane and civilizing agencies for the ultimate solution of what is called the Indian problem. It may be very difficult and require much patient effort to curb the unruly spirit of the savage Indian to the restraints of civilized life, but experience shows that it is not impossible. Many of the tribes which are now quiet and orderly and self-supporting were once as savage as any that at present roam over the plains or in the mountains of the Far West, and were then considered inaccessible to civilizing influences. It may be impossible to raise them fully up to the level of the white population of the United States, but we should not forget that they are the aborigines of the country, and called the soil their own on which our people have grown rich, powerful, and happy. We owe it to them as a moral duty to help them in attaining at least that degree of civilization which they may be able to reach. It is not only our duty—it is also our interest to do so. Indians who have become agriculturists or herdsmen, and feel an interest in property, will thenceforth cease to be a warlike and disturbing element. It is also a well authenticated fact that Indians are apt to be peaceable and quiet when their children are at school, and I am gratified to know, from the expressions of Indians themselves, and from many concurring reports, that there is a steadily increasing desire, even among Indians belonging to comparatively wild tribes, to have their children educated. I invite attention to the reports of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, touching the experiment recently inaugurated, in taking fifty Indian children, boys and girls, from different tribes, to the Hampton Normal Agricultural Institute, in Virginia, where they are to receive an elementary English education and training in agriculture and other useful work, to be returned to their tribes, after the completed course, as interpreters, instructors, and examples. It is reported that the officer charged with the selection of those children might have had thousands of young Indians sent with him had it been possible to make provision for them. I agree with the Secretary of the Interior in saying that "the result of this interesting experiment, if favorable, may be destined to become an important factor in the advancement of civilization among the Indians."

The question whether a change in the control of the Indian service should be made was, at the last session of Congress, referred to a committee for inquiry and report. Without desiring to anticipate that report, I venture to express the hope that in the decision of so important a question the views expressed above may not be lost sight of, and that the decision, whatever it may be, will arrest further agitation of this subject, such agitation being apt to produce a disturbing effect upon the service as well as on the Indians themselves.

In the enrollment of the bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses at the last session of Congress that portion which provided for the continuation of the Hot Springs commission was omitted. As the commission had completed the work of taking testimony on the many conflicting claims, the suspension of their labors, before determining the rights of claimants, threatened, for a time, to embarrass the interests, not only of the Government, but also of a large number of the citizens of Hot Springs, who were waiting for final action on their claims before beginning contemplated improvements. In order to prevent serious difficulties, which were apprehended, and at the solicitation of many leading citizens of Hot Springs, and others interested in the welfare of the town, the Secretary of the Interior was authorized to request the late commissioners to take charge of the records of their proceedings, and to perform such work as could properly be done by them under such circumstances, to facilitate the future adjudication of the claims at an early day and to preserve the status of the claimants until their rights should be finally determined. The late commissioners complied with that request, and report that the testimony in all the cases has been written out, examined, briefed, and so arranged as to facilitate an early settlement when authorized by law. It is recommended that the requisite authority be given at as early a day in the session as possible, and that a fair compensation be allowed the late commissioners for the expense incurred and the labor performed by them since the 25th of June last.

I invite the attention of Congress to the recommendations made by the Secretary of the Interior with regard to the preservation of the timber on the public lands of the United States. The protection of the public property is one of the first duties of the Government. The Department of the Interior should therefore be enabled by sufficient appropriations to enforce the laws in that respect. But this matter appears still more important as a question of public economy. The rapid destruction of our forests is an evil fraught with the gravest consequences, especially in the mountainous districts, where the rocky slopes, once denuded of their trees, will remain so forever. There the injury, once done, cannot be repaired. I fully concur with the Secretary of the Interior in the opinion that, for this reason, legislation touching the public timber in the mountainous States and Territories of the West should be especially well considered, and that existing laws, in which the destruction of the forests is not sufficiently guarded against, should be speedily modified. A general law concerning this important subject appears to me to be a matter of urgent public necessity.

From the organization of the Government, the importance of encouraging, by all possible means, the increase of our agricultural productions has been acknowledged and urged upon the attention of Congress and the people as the surest and readiest means of increasing our substantial and enduring prosperity.

The words of Washington are as applicable to-day as when, in his eighth annual message, he said: "It is not to be doubted that, with reference either to individual or national welfare, agriculture is of primary importance. In proportion as nations advance in population and other circumstances of maturity, this truth becomes more apparent, and renders the cultivation of the soil more and more an object of public patronage. Institutions for promoting it grow up, supported by the public purse—and to what object can it be dedicated with greater propriety? Among the means which have been employed to this end, none have been attended with greater success than the establishment of boards composed of proper characters, charged with collecting and diffusing information, and enabled, by premiums and small pecuniary aids, to encourage and assist the spirit of discovery and improvement, this species of establishment contributing doubly to the increase of improvement by stimulating to enterprise and experiment, and by drawing to a common center the results everywhere of individual skill and observation, and spreading them thence over the whole nation. Experience accordingly hath shown that they are very cheap instruments of immense national benefit."

The great preponderance of the agricultural over any other interest in the United States entitles it to all the consideration claimed for it by Washington. About one-half of the population of the United States is engaged in agriculture. The value of the agricultural products of the United States for the year 1878 is estimated at $3,000,000,000. The exports of agricultural products for the year 1877, as appears from the report of the Bureau of Statistics, were $524,000,000. The great extent of our country, with its diversity of soil and climate, enables us to produce within our own borders and by our own labor not only the necessaries but most of the luxuries that are consumed in civilized countries. Yet, notwithstanding our advantages of soil, climate, and intercommunication, it appears from the statistical statements in the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture that we import annually from foreign lands many millions of dollars' worth of agricultural products which could be raised in our own country.

Numerous questions arise in the practice of advanced agriculture which can only be answered by experiments, often costly and sometimes fruitless, which are beyond the means of private individuals, and are a just and proper charge on the whole nation for the benefit of the nation. It is good policy, especially in times of depression and uncertainty in other business pursuits, with a vast area of uncultivated, and hence unproductive, territory wisely opened to homestead settlement, to encourage, by every proper and legitimate means, the occupation and tillage of the soil. The efforts of the Department of Agriculture to stimulate old and introduce new agricultural industries, to improve the quality and increase the quantity of our products, to determine the value of old or establish the importance of new methods of culture, are worthy of your careful and favorable consideration, and assistance by such appropriations of money and enlargement of facilities as may seem to be demanded by the present favorable conditions for the growth and rapid development of this important interest.

The abuse of animals in transit is widely attracting public attention. A national convention of societies specially interested in the subject has recently met at Baltimore, and the facts developed, both in regard to cruelties to animals and the effect of such cruelties upon the public health, would seem to demand the careful consideration of Congress, and the enactment of more efficient laws for the prevention of these abuses.

The report of the Commissioner of the Bureau of Education shows very gratifying progress throughout the country, in all the interests committed to the care of this important office. The report is especially encouraging with respect to the extension of the advantages of the common-school system in sections of the country where the general enjoyment of the privilege of free schools is not yet attained.

To education more than to any other agency we are to look, as the resource for the advancement of the people in the requisite knowledge and appreciation of their rights and responsiblities as citizens, and I desire to repeat the suggestion contained in my former message in behalf of the enactment of appropriate measures by Congress for the purpose of supplementing with national aid the local systems of education in the several States.

Adequate accommodations for the great library which is overgrowing the capacity of the rooms now occupied at the Capitol should be provided without further delay. This invaluable collection of books, manuscripts, and illustrative art has grown to such proportions, in connection with the copyright system of the country, as to demand the prompt and careful attention of Congress to save it from injury in its present crowded and insufficient quarters. As this library is national in its character, and must, from the nature of the case, increase even more rapidly in the future than in the past, it cannot be doubted that the people will sanction any wise expenditure to preserve it and to enlarge its usefulness.

The appeal of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution for the means to organize, exhibit, and make available for the public benefit the articles now stored away belonging to the National Museum, I heartily recommend to your favorable consideration.

The attention of Congress is again invited to the condition of the river front of the city of Washington. It is a matter of vital importance to the health of the residents of the National Capital, both temporary and permanent, that the lowlands in front of the city, now subject to tidal overflow, should be reclaimed. In their present condition these flats obstruct the drainage of the city and are a dangerous source of malarial poison. The reclamation will improve the navigation of the river by restricting and consequently deepening its channel, and is also of importance when considered in connection with the extension of the public ground and the enlargement of the park west and south of the Washington Monument. The report of the board of survey, heretofore ordered by act of Congress, on the improvement of the harbor of Washington and Georgetown, is respectfully commended to consideration.

The report of the commissioners of the District of Columbia presents a detailed statement of the affairs of the District.

The relative expenditures by the United States and the District for local purposes is contrasted, showing that the expenditures by the people of the District greatly exceed those of the General Government. The exhibit is made in connection with estimates for the requisite repair of the defective pavements and sewers of the city, which is a work of immediate necessity, and, in the same connection, a plan is presented for the permanent funding of the outstanding securities of the District.

The benevolent, reformatory, and penal institutions of the District are all entitled to the favorable attention of Congress. The Reform School needs additional buildings and teachers. Appropriations which will place all of these institutions in a condition to become models of usefulness and beneficence will be regarded by the country as liberality wisely bestowed.

The commissioners, with evident justice, request attention to the discrimination made by Congress against the District in the donation of land for the support of the public schools, and ask that the same liberality that has been shown to the inhabitants of the various States and Territories of the United States may be extended to the District of Columbia.

The commissioners also invite attention to the damage inflicted upon public and private interests by the present location of the depots and switching-tracks of the several railroads entering the city, and ask for legislation looking to their removal. The recommendations and suggestions contained in the report will, I trust, receive the careful consideration of Congress.

Sufficient time has, perhaps, not elapsed since the reorganization of the government of the District, under the recent legislation of Congress, for the expression of a confident opinion as to its successful operation; but the practical results already attained are so satisfactory that the friends of the new government may well urge upon Congress the wisdom of its continuance, without essential modification, until, by actual experience, its advantages and defects may be more fully ascertained.

R. B. HAYES.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, December 2, 1878.

The message, with the accompanying documents, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

DEPARTMENTAL REPORTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances for the year 1878; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Attorney-General, transmitting the annual report of the Department of Justice for the year 1878; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate the sixteenth annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at two o'clock and twenty-six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 2, 1878.

This being the day designated by the Constitution, the members of the House of Representatives of the Forty-fifth Congress assembled in their Hall for their third session. At twelve o'clock m., the Speaker, Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, a member from the State of Pennsylvania, called the House to order.

PRAYER.

The Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D., offered the following prayer:

To Thee, Almighty God our Heavenly Father, the Giver of every good and perfect gift, the Author of all our mercies, we render thanks for the good providence which has spared the lives of these representatives of the people and permitted them again to assemble to resume their legislative labors.

O God, our Father, we implore the divine protection and guidance in their behalf, that in all the measures of legislation divine wisdom may aid them; that all that is done may promote the welfare of the people.

We pray Thy blessing upon Thy servants, the President and Vice-President of the United States, the officers and members of the Senate, the presiding officer and officers of this House, and all these representatives.

O Lord, our God, may it please Thee to bless our common country, that peace and harmony may prevail everywhere, and all bitterness and strife may be done away. May justice and harmony and peace and prosperity prevail throughout our land, that all the people of all the sections may be united in the bonds of brotherly love.

These and all other blessings Thou seest we need we ask in the name of Jesus Christ our Redeemer. Amen.

ROLL-CALL.

The SPEAKER. This being the time fixed by the Constitution for the opening of the third session of the Forty-fifth Congress, the Clerk will now call the roll of members to ascertain whether there be a quorum present, and will also call the names of the Delegates from the several Territories.

The Clerk then called the roll, and the following members answered to their names:

The SPEAKER. Members desiring to announce the absence of their colleagues and the reason therefor will now have an opportunity of doing so.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. My colleague, Mr. SMITH, is absent in consequence of sickness in his family, and desires leave of absence for a few days.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and leave of absence will be granted accordingly.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. My colleague, Mr. PRIDEMORE, is detained at home by illness in his family.

Mr. BLACKBURN. My colleague, Mr. CARLISLE, is absent by reason of important business.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Indiana. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, Mr. HANNA, on account of important business.

Mr. SLEMONS. My colleague, Mr. GAUSE, is detained at home by sickness.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. My colleague, Mr. CULBERSON, is detained at home on account of important business, and asks leave of absence for one week.

Mr. FINLEY. My colleague, Mr. DICKEY, is detained at home on important business.

Mr. CLAFLIN. My colleague, Mr. LORING, is detained at home by illness.

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and thirty-six members have answered to their names, more than a quorum. If there are any new members to be sworn in they will now come forward.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that a quorum of that body had assembled and was ready to proceed to business.

It further announced the passage of a resolution providing for the appointment of a committee on its part, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House, to wait upon the President and inform him a quorum of each House had assembled, and that Congress was ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make, and that Mr. ANTHONY and Mr. BAYARD had been appointed as such committee on its part.

NEW MEMBERS SWORN.

Mr. JAMES. I present the credentials of Mr. John M. Bailey, elected to fill the vacancy in the sixteenth congressional district of the State of New York, occasioned by the death of Mr. Terrence J. Quinn.

Mr. SAPP. I present the credentials of Mr. Thomas J. Majors, elected to fill the vacancy in the representation of the State of Nebraska, occasioned by the death of Mr. Frank Welch. The credentials are regular, and there is no contest.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the reading of the certificates will be waived, and they will be printed as part of the proceedings.

There was no objection.

Mr. BAILEY and Mr. MAJORS presented themselves, and were duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by section 1756 of the Revised Statutes.

The certificates are as follows:

State of New York, ss:

We, the secretary of state, comptroller, attorney-general, and State engineer and surveyor of said State, having formed a board of State canvassers, and having canvassed and estimated the whole number of votes given for Representative in the Forty-fifth Congress of the United States in the sixteenth congressional district in said State, at the general election held in the said State on the 5th day of November, 1878, according to the certified statements of the said votes received by the secretary of state in the manner directed by law, do hereby determine, declare, and certify that John M. Bailey, by the greatest number of votes given in the said district, at said election, was, in accordance with the laws of said State, duly and regularly elected Representative of the State of New York in the Forty-fifth Congress of the United States, in place of Terrence J. Quinn, deceased.

Given under our hands at the office of the secretary of state of said State, in the city of Albany, the 25th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1878.

STATE OF NEW YORK,
Office of the Secretary of State, ss:

I certify that I have compared the foregoing with an original certificate filed in this office, and that the same is a correct transcript therefrom and of the whole of such original.

Given under my hand and seal of office, at the city of Albany, this 25th day of November, 1878.

[L. S.] ALLEN C. BEACH,
Secretary of State.

STATE OF NEBRASKA EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Lincoln, November 20, 1878.

I, Silas Garber, governor of the State of Nebraska, do hereby certify that a general election for the State of Nebraska was held November 5, 1878, pursuant to law and in accordance with the proclamation hereto attached; that the votes cast at said election for other than executive State officers were duly canvassed this day in the manner provided by law, and that for the office of Representative in Congress, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Hon. Frank Welch, Thomas J. Majors received 28,221 votes; Alexander Bear, 21,124 votes; scattering, 21; and Thomas J Majors having received the highest number of votes cast, he was declared duly elected to the office of Representative in Congress for the State of Nebraska, to fill the vacancy in the Forty-fifth Congress of the United States occasioned as aforesaid.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the State of Nebraska to be hereunto affixed.

Done at Lincoln this 20th day of November, A. D. 1878.

[L. S.] SILAS GARBER, Governor.

By the governor:
BRUNO TZSCHUCK, Secretary of State.

PROCLAMATION

Whereas the death of Hon. Frank Welch has caused a vacancy in the office of Representative in Congress to exist in this State; and

Whereas the Constitution of the United States requires the executive to issue writs of election to fill such vacancies,

Therefore I, Silas Garber, governor of the State of Nebraska, do hereby notify the county commissioners of the several counties of this State that it becomes their duty to take the necessary steps, in the manner prescribed by law, for the election of a Representative to the Forty-fifth Congress to fill the unexpired term for which the late Hon. Frank Welch was elected, and that said election shall take place at the general election to be held on Tuesday, the 5th day of November, A. D. 1878, and the returns of said election shall be made to the secretary of state, as directed by law.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused to be affixed the great seal of the State of Nebraska.

Done at Lincoln this 17th day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and third, and of the State of Nebraska the thirteenth.

By the governor:
BRUNO TZSCHUCK, Secretary of State.

MESSAGE TO THE SENATE.

Mr. WOOD submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to inform the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled and that the House is ready to proceed to business.

MESSAGE TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. ATKINS submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of three members be appointed on the part of the House, to join the committee which has been appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait upon the President and inform him that a quorum of both Houses has assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The SPEAKER named as members of such committee on the part of the House Mr. ATKINS of Tennessee, Mr. COX of New York, and Mr. GARFIELD of Ohio.

RECESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House take a recess for one hour.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at twelve o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House took a recess for one hour.

The recess having expired, the House resumed its session.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, the joint committee appointed to wait upon the President and inform him that the two Houses are ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make have discharged that duty, and he requested us to say to the two Houses that he will send a communication to them immediately.

Mr. W. K. RODGERS, Private Secretary of the President, having been announced at the bar, said:

Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the President of the United States to deliver to the House of Representatives a message in writing.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the message just received from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read the annual message.

[It will be found in the proceedings of the Senate.]

PRINTING THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE, ETC.

Mr. WOOD. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President's annual message be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WOOD. I cannot avoid making one or two remarks with reference to a portion of the President's message. Although, as a whole, the document is highly satisfactory, as it will doubtless be to the country, yet there are some references in it which I think should be met at the earliest practicable moment. I allude to that portion which relates to the late elections in the Southern States. I fail to see, that which the President appears to see, any disposition in the South to void or to annul in any regard the recent amendments to the Constitution. I have failed to see any indication on the part of the people of the Southern States at any election, at any time, under any circumstances, for a series of years past, of a disposition differing from that of the rest of the country to obey the laws and the Government under which we live.

I regret that insinuations to the contrary should come from the President. He commenced his administration with a noble and patriotic declaration that he was opposed to the military despotism which had been exercised by his predecessor over the Southern States and that he would withdraw the troops and give to that people the same right of self-government which is vouchsafed under our institutions to all people. I have watched, sir, with interest the history of this Administration from that time to this to see whether the President would live up to this or be forced from it by an aggressive wing of his own party, who were dissatisfied with the position he had taken. And it has been a matter of great interest to the whole country to know whether he would continue the noble and patriotic course he had marked out for himself in this regard, or whether he would succumb to the reckless and radical elements who flourish only in controversy, sectional strife, and bloodshed.

Now sir, while the President expresses it in very mild and very decorous language, yet he indicates quite clearly that the condition of the South is not satisfactory. He refers especially to the elections in South Carolina and Louisiana. Although there are thirteen Southern States, yet he has been able to single out but two States, and two isolated instances in those two States, which he dignifies by making them an object of discussion in his present annual message. Sir, this is an ominous and portentous indication. It is an indication of vacillation and of weakness utterly beneath him and the exalted position he holds. And being an indication of the present disposition of the Executive, I tremble for the future welfare of the country if he has thus fallen a victim to the worst element of the party to which he belongs. With this feeling I have felt it my duty to interpose my denial to these charges. They are without substantial foundation. The President's eyes were wide open to a few unimportant disturbances and irregularities in Carolina and Louisiana, but were tightly closed to what occurred in the city of New York, where four thousand citizens, legally registered voters, with as much right to vote as you or myself, were dragged to prison by Government officials on the morning of the late election and committed by the hundreds to an iron cage, miscalled a prison, as common prisoners guilty of crime. Almost within the hearing of the President these arbitrary arrests were made and the right of suffrage denied and the grossest outrages perpetrated upon thousands of white men who were guilty of no offense except that it be an offense to support the democratic party. Those who have induced the President to complain of these alleged Southern wrongs took good care to omit asking him to include the far greater wrongs which transpired in the great city of New York. The President did not hear of these frauds and intimidations, and the republican press of New York took care not to inform him of them.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that the President has thought proper to lend the sanction of his high office to the reiteration of the misrepresentation with reference to the South. I believe him to be an honest and patriotic man, and that he should permit himself thus to become an instrument in the hands of the ultra wing of the republican party is a matter, in my judgment, for profound regret.

I will now, unless some gentleman desires to be heard, move the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me for a few moments?

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman from Ohio wish?

Mr. GARFIELD. Five or ten minutes.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I will yield to the gentleman for ten minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is very unusual, Mr. Speaker, to interrupt these ordinary formal proceedings of receiving and printing the President's annual message by debating any of its suggestions; and the remarks of the gentleman from New York are especially inopportune in view of the fact that we have not the advantage of seeing in print the exact language of the President which the gentleman has seen fit to criticise. Indeed, I do not remember the precise language of the message, as read at the Clerk's desk; but the purpose of the gentleman from New York is very plain. He calls attention to certain references in the message to some alleged disturbance and illegal proceedings in the course of the recent national elections in several of the States of this Union, and contrasts this reference with what he chooses to call "the noble beginning of the Administration in favor of self-government." The gentleman charges the Administration with vacillation, because the President has seen fit to refer to disturbances in the Federal elections.

Now, if the right of a State to attend to its own local concerns undisturbed is in any way inconsistent with the right of the National Government to attend to national elections and see that they are undisturbed; if that is what the gentleman calls vacillation, I hope we shall all vacillate; that we shall be quite as determined to maintain the right of the National Government to secure to all its citizens the undisturbed right to participate freely in national elections under national laws as we are to defend the rights of State governments in the just exercise of all their functions in local affairs.

The gentleman seems in haste to convict the Administration of inconsistency; but if he can make no stronger case than this, I doubt if his followers will congratulate him on this early opening of the winter's debate.

The gentleman says he cannot see that there has been any disturbance in any elections except in his own city.

The gentleman has doubtless seen if not disturbances at least some changes, perhaps some vacillation, in his city and State which may have obscured his vision as to other disturbances, but I did not suppose he was specially anxious to discuss them. But for his remarks I should not have been so unkind as to remind him of them at this time.

But even if the gentleman did not see any disturbances in the recent national elections elsewhere, yet if the President did see them it was his duty as the Chief Executive to say so, and he has said so in his annual message.

This is not the time to discuss the topics of which the message treats; but it is proper to say that if the President has seen that in any part of this Union there has been a failure to recognize the full rights of all citizens, however humble, or however black, to their rights of suffrage under the Constitution and laws, he would not only neglect his duty, but would commit a positive fault if he did not lay the facts before Congress and suggest a remedy. He has referred to it modestly and temperately, and has invited the attention of Congress to the alleged wrongs. Does the gentleman object to having the attention of Congress called to so grave an allegation? Has any gentleman from the South or North any reason why he does not wish the attention of Congress pointed to it? Can it be a small matter which is said to involve the rights of perhaps a million people in at least two States of the Union?

I welcome this calling of the attention of Congress to the elections anywhere in the country; and where respectable authority alleges an interference with the full rights of American citizens in a national election, such allegation deserves the prompt and careful consideration of this body. Even in the gentleman's own view of the case he ought to thank the President for opening the question, for it affords the gentleman an excellent opportunity to have these vacillations in his city examined also. If any wrong has been done to him or his friends in New York, I hope they will also be examined.

Now, I may be misinformed, and I am not now here to charge any State or the people of any State with committing wrong; but the impression has been made upon my mind, after a somewhat careful reading of the public journals of this country, that very considerable illegal disturbances have taken place in some of the States referred to by the President. I do not know it to be true; but so much has been said that even in my remote quarter of the Union I have heard more about it than the gentleman from New York seems to have heard. I have often heard it said that bold, open intimidation and concealed fraud were employed in one or two States, notably in the State of South Carolina; and that in districts in which overwhelming majorities of one political party had hitherto shown themselves, that majority was not only suppressed at the recent election, but there was no sign of its existence at the ballot-box. Perhaps this is an exaggeration; but, if so, it is an exaggeration that has been sown broadcast throughout the public press. And in a Congress so notable as this for investigating all charges of wrong-doing [laughter on the republican side] I should have supposed that our friends on the other side would have welcomed this suggestion of the President as exactly in the line of their policy. Yet instead of that, before the message has been printed, before any of the usual courtesies have been shown, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] rises and expresses his surprise and astonishment that there should be any reference whatever to these notable circumstances alleged to be facts by so large a number of citizens. I hope the gentleman will not, as we have so often heard charged upon this floor, seek to stifle investigation. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. WOOD. One word, Mr. Speaker, in reply to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] to correct an error into which he has fallen as to the practice in regard to the President's message. It certainly must be within his recollection that very frequently motions to refer to the Committee of the Whole the message of the President have led to debate.

Aside from that, however, I desire to correct the gentleman in another regard. He says I expressed my surprise. He is in error; I expressed my regret that the Chief Executive of the United States, when able to indicate only two instances occurring in but two States of the Union, should have deemed those two cases of sufficient importance to be presented to the world in his annual message as indicating a rebellious southern spirit. There is little in the message itself on this subject that is really important aside from the fact that the President in his so-called "southern policy" has gone back on himself, and this is a grave and significant indication. I am not surprised that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] should hear in his district what is not heard elsewhere. Nor am I surprised that he and others have succeeded in inducing the Executive to aid them in raising the "bloody shirt," [laughter on the republican side,] so that they can hold on to their ill-gotten power and continue that power by the aid of the Treasury of the United States. I now call the previous question.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] yield to me for two or three minutes?

Mr. WOOD. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I should say nothing here and now but for the to me surprising attempt on the part of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and the leader of his side of the House, to belittle the subject-matter which the President has, in my judgment, fittingly brought to our attention.

The gentleman from New York is alarmed that the President should have seen fit in his message to call the attention of this House to excesses and violences and perhaps frauds in two States of this Union. He blames the Chief Magistrate because he has seen fit to refer to so small a matter as that. Why, sir, a British ministry has before now been driven from office because it failed to interpose the protection of the government when the right of a single British citizen has been assailed or interfered with either abroad or at home or in any of the dependent provinces of that great empire. And the gentleman from New York stands here and in this unprecedented fashion blames the President because he asks our attention to the wholesale deprivation of the rights of citizens by thousands throughout two States of this Union.

Sir, this question will not and shall not be allowed to be put down in this way. The President of the United States honestly and earnestly in the direction of conciliation did what many of his party friends believed to be injudicious, while others sustained him, in withdrawing every armed soldier in the South and let home government, as it was called, set in. Now, upon the heels of that, when no soldier stalks in any southern election precinct, when no bayonet is compelling peace or forcing power upon southern communities, when there should be in South Carolina and in Florida and in every other Southern State the same freedom in elections that there is in Northern States—upon the heels of all this come outrages, frauds, and the blackest sort of cheating, to which the President has called our attention. And the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] says that this is an indication that the President is to be dragooned by the radical wing of the republican party into the course indicated by his message. He regrets that that wing of the party is likely to control.

Now let me tell the gentleman that on this fundamental doctrine of the protection of the citizen in all his rights there is no radical and no conservative wing of the republican party. However much the proposition may be sought to be put down, however much other things may be arrayed for the purpose of stifling the discussion of it, there is one party in the land that is so united to a man upon the proposition that the American citizen, North, South, and everywhere, must be and shall be protected in the exercise of all his constitutional rights. [Applause on the republican side.]

Mr. WOOD. I yield five minutes to my colleague, [Mr. COX, of New York.]

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am very much delighted to see my friend from Maine. [Laughter.] I was afraid he had gone so far north that he had dropped into Simm's Hole, or some other place. [Laughter.] I wonder that my friend did not complain of some "vacillations" in the State of Maine and BLAINE. [Laughter.] I wonder that he did not call us to an account in one form or another as to certain little elections that took place up there, instead of being so prompt to censure my colleague for his remarks about New York and other matters. Why should my colleague be censured by the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Maine?

What did my colleague remark? Simply this: that he regretted the President was color-blind; except this, that he could see things in South Carolina and Louisiana, while he could not see the monstrous tyranny of Federal officers in other cities, especially in the city and State of New York. Does the gentleman know what transpired in that city at the election? Does he know the conduct of the United States commissioner? That superserviceable official has called in question the naturalization of over fifty thousand people, male and female, naturalized from 1853 to 1868. By raising a question as to the naturalization of certain persons during these fifteen years he has put in jeopardy estates which passed through the phases of acquirement, escheatment, &c., during that time, to say nothing of that high estate of the American citizen—adopted or not—the right of suffrage, in regard to which your President has said in his message just read that in this country it is the right of every citizen to cast an honest vote and to have his vote counted honestly!

There may have been irregularities South; there may have been tissue ballots placed in some boxes, as I see it alleged. But when gentlemen make a point of that kind, as no doubt the President in his message meant to do, they fail to remember that the navy-yards, run under radical supervision, (which the gentleman from Maine knows all about,) ran, not very recently, the "tape-worm" ticket in California, a foot long and an inch wide. [Laughter.] Microscopes were in demand. Did I hear the eloquent gentleman from Ohio or the gentleman from Maine, when it was presented here, ever denounce tape-worm tickets and politics? Not much. [Laughter.]

No, Mr. Speaker, when in the city of New York men were taken from their homes because they happened to be naturalized in a particular year (1868, when frauds were doubtless committed;) when it was sought to invalidate all records of naturalization for that year because of certain frauds of a limited character; when there was scouted the principle that a record of naturalization, like other records, imports absolute verity, and the onus probandi lies on the other side to invalidate it; when the power was exercised by a United States officer by imprisoning hundreds to intimidate thousands of voters—to defeat among others my valued friend here on my right, [Mr. EICKHOFF,] who lost a thousand votes by this villiany and outrage; when all this was done, ah, sir, the eyes of the Executive, who was himself counted in so honestly, were closed to the great facts transpiring so recently in the city of New York and other cities under similar Federal supervision.

Mr. Speaker, I am not responsible for the beginning of this debate. I shrink from no investigation as to any election North or South. I demand it whenever there is a challenge. I do not know why there is on the other side a disposition to laugh when we speak of this subject.

Mr. O'NEILL. It is so funny coming from that side of the House.

Mr. COX, of New York. Why, it is not funny. You have a President counted in by fraud, as we all know how. It is not funny.

Mr. NEAL made an inaudible remark.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not hear the remark of the gentleman. They are laughing on the other side, probably for want of thought.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, rose.

Mr. COX, of New York. What I wish to say is simply this: this side of the House has the right to investigate all frauds, and will demand it——

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. We were only thinking of those "ciphers."

Mr. COX, of New York. Why, sir, this gentleman is another of the "vacillations" of the House. [Laughter.] There has been a great "vacillation" all over the country; but, thank God, with all the "vacillations" the old democratic party will in the next Congress have the Senate and the House also. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WOOD. I now demand the previous question on the adoption of my resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution of Mr. WOOD was adopted.

Mr. WOOD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WEST POINT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DURHAM, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5230) making appropriations for the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I reserve all points of order on this bill.

Mr. DURHAM. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed. I also give notice that after the morning hour to-morrow I will call it up for consideration.

The motion of Mr. DURHAM was agreed to.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5231) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I reserve all points of order on this bill.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I give notice that on Wednesday next I shall move that the House go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this bill.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. SMITH, of Georgia, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family;

To Mr. BOUCK, for one week, on account of important business; and

To Mr. DAVIDSON, for twelve days, on account of sickness.

Mr. WOOD. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at three o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ATKINS: The petition of James M. McRea, of Jackson, Madison County, Tennessee, for compensation for property taken by the United States Army during the late war—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, the petition of John W. Willett, of Denmark, Madison County, Tennessee, of similar import—to the same committee.

Also, papers relating to the claim of Isaiah Sweat, of McNairy County, Tennessee, for compensation for property taken by the United States Army—to the same committee.

By Mr. CHITTENDEN: The petition of Ann M. Paulding, widow of the late Rear-Admiral Paulding, for a pension; together with a letter from the Secretary of the Navy acknowledging the eminent services rendered by Admiral Paulding—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LAPHAM: The petition of Ralph T. Wood, William S.

Briggs, and others, of Penn Yan, New York, favoring the granting of the petition of Howland Hemphill for payment of damages suffered by him in consequence of the acts of agents of the United States Government—to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. MANNING: The petition of Nancy P. Garison, of Benton County, Mississippi, for compensation for quartermaster stores, subsistence, and supplies taken by the United States Army—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. McCOOK: The petition of George C. Jenks, for an extension of letters-patent upon an improvement in drop-letter boxes—to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of Margaret Dickson, widow of James Dickson, late a private in Company B, Sixty-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RICE, of Ohio: The petition of Edward J. Russell, late a private in Company F, Nineteenth Indiana Volunteers, for an increase of pension—to the same committee.

By Mr. WILLITS: The petition of William Shade, for a pension—to the same committee.

By Mr. YOUNG: The petition of George W. Beasley, of La Grange, Fayette County, Tennessee, for compensation for property taken by the United States Army during the late war—to the Committee of Claims.

Also, the petition of Rosanna H. Black, of Hardeman County, Tennessee, of similar import—to the same committee.

Also, the petition of Mrs. Martha C. Cole, of Germantown, Shelby County, Tennessee, of similar import—to the same committee.

Also, the petition of William R. Kearney, of Bolivar, Hardeman County, Tennessee, of similar import—to the same committee.

Also, the petition of John H. McClellan, of Memphis, Tennessee, of similar import—to the same committee.

Also, the petition of Lewallen Rhodes, of Germantown, Shelby County, Tennessee, of similar import—to the same committee.

Also, the petition of John H. Wooley, of La Grange, Tennessee, of similar import—to the same committee.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 3, 1878.

JOHN B. GORDON, a Senator from the State of Georgia; AUGUSTUS S. MERRIMON, a Senator from the State of North Carolina; PRESTON B. PLUMB, a Senator from the State of Kansas; and WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE, a Senator from the State of Maryland, appeared in their seats to-day.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

COMMITTEES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the election of the standing and select committees of the Senate for the present session.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask that the rule which requires the committees to be selected by ballot be dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island? The Chair hears none, and the rule is dispensed with.

Mr. ANTHONY. Understanding it to be agreeable to our friends on the other side, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the standing and other committees of the Senate existing at the close of the last session, be, and the same are hereby, revived and continued, with the same powers, until the further order of the Senate.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

The committees as thus constituted are as follows:

To inquire into certain matters touching the late presidential election in Louisiana—Messrs. Edmunds, (chairman,) Allison, Ingalls, Hoar, Davis of Illinois, Whyte, and Jones of Florida.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented the petition of Horace S. Spear, late a private of Company I, Fifth Regiment Vermont Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present four petitions of like character, printed on similar paper in the same way, from sundry pensioners, asking for arrears of pension. These are of the same character that have been presented from time to time and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS. Let them lie on the table, as that subject has been reported upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petitions will lie upon the table.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of John S. Cunningham, a pay director in the United States Navy, praying to be reimbursed for moneys of which the Government was defrauded by his clerk, the loss of which was assumed by him; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of numerous ship-owners, masters, and merchants of Oregon, praying an appropriation for a harbor of refuge at Port Orford, Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BOOTH presented a petition of night inspectors of the customs for the district of San Francisco, praying that their compensation be increased from $2.50 per diem to what it was formerly, $3 per diem: which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented the petition of Mrs. P. L. Ward, widow and executrix of William Ward, deceased, praying compensation for stores alleged to have been furnished and delivered to the Navy Department and the Quartermaster's Department of the Army by her late husband in the years 1860 and 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ARMSTRONG presented the petition of Samuel C. Reid, in behalf of the heirs of the claimants of the late United States private armed brig General Armstrong, praying for compensation for the loss of the brig, which was destroyed by the British fleet in the port of Fayal, one of the Azores Islands, in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1420) for the relief of Mrs. P. L. Ward; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1421) to authorize the issue of certificates of deposit; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. MORRILL. Let the bill be read in full.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be reported at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue, in exchange for United States notes or coin, certificates of deposit of the denomination of $10, or any multiple thereof not exceeding $100, bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum, and convertible at any time within one year into the 4 per cent. bonds described in the refunding act; and the money so received shall be applied to the payment of the 5.20 bonds in the mode prescribed by said act; and he is authorized to prescribe suitable rules and regulations in conformity with this act.

Mr. ARMSTRONG asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1422) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 3, A. D. 1875; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard.

Mr. BECK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1423) for the relief of William R. Boice; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BAYARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1424) to amend the law with respect to wills, to regulate the transaction of probate business in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BAYARD. I introduce this bill at the request of the Bar Association of the District, and move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1425) to incorporate the Mount Pleasant and Potomac Side Railway Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

CUSTOM-HOUSE LOT IN PROVIDENCE.

Mr. BURNSIDE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire into the expediency of directing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase, by condemnation or otherwise, all that portion of the block of land (with buildings thereon) upon which stands the old custom-house, in the city of Providence, which does not now belong to the United States, provided the sum to be paid for the same shall not exceed $120,000.

SILVER COIN FOR DUTIES.

Mr. BECK submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate what amount of silver coin has been received in payment of customs dues since the beginning of the current fiscal year, and whether or not he has applied the silver coin so received, in whole or in part, to the payment of the interest on the bonds or notes of the United States; if it has not been so applied, to state the reason why; if it has been applied to that purpose in part only, to state what portion has been so used and on what character of obligation. He is directed to inform the Senate the amount of interest he has paid on the bonds and notes of the United States since the current fiscal year began, and the amount of such interest which he has paid in gold and silver coin respectively.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the resolution so amended as to require the Secretary to specify the kind of silver coin, so as to see whether the coin dollar has been received, or some of the subsidiary coinage as well.

Mr. BECK. I supposed that the standard silver dollar was the only silver coin that could possibly be received for duties; but I have no objection to the resolution being amended in the way suggested.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The payment of small sums of duties might have been made in half dollars or quarters. I am sure the Senator can have no objection to asking how much and what kind of coin has been received, wherever the proper place in the resolution is.

Mr. BECK. Not at all. Let the resolution be amended by inserting the words "and denomination" after "inform the Senate what amount."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so amended, if there be no objection.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

THE TRADE-DOLLAR.

Mr. PADDOCK submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of making the trade-dollar authorized by section 15 of the act of Congress approved February 12, 1873, a legal tender for all debts, public and private, providing for the suspension of the coinage of the standard dollar of 412½ grains, the recoinage of the same into the trade-dollar of 420 grains, and for such additional coinage of the trade-dollar as the needs of the country may demand.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the resolution had better be printed and go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be printed; and it goes over under the rule.

PROPOSED TRANSFER OF INDIAN BUREAU.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I move to take from the table the resolution which I submitted yesterday on the subject of printing the testimony taken by the joint committee to consider the feasibility of transferring the Indian Bureau to the War Department.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair remembers that the resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The suggestion of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] was that it take the regular course, which he thought would require it to go to the Committee on Printing. There is necessity for this printing to be done now. Under the rules, I think it would not be necessary for the resolution to go to the Committee on Printing, and it need not go there unless the Senate should so decide by a majority vote. There is great necessity for expediting this work.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair and the Secretary both understood the Senator from West Virginia to move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Printing, and the motion is so recorded upon the Journal.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think the Chair is correct; but upon information received since my suggestion of yesterday I have no objection to any disposition of the matter that the Senator from Nebraska desires to make.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not suppose at the time that the resolution under the rule would go to the Committee on Printing, but upon the motion of the Senator from West Virginia it did go there. Is there objection that the order by which the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska was referred to the Committee on Printing be reconsidered? The Chair hears none, and the motion to reconsider is agreed to. The resolution is before the Senate and will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Public Printer is hereby authorized and directed to print the testimony taken and to be taken, the reports of the committee, and the accompanying documents, of the joint committee to consider the feasibility of transferring the Indian Bureau to the War Department.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to make one inquiry. This is a very important subject, we all know, and I desire to know of the Senator from Nebraska whether he proposes to have the usual number of copies of the testimony printed for the use of the Senate, or simply to have copies printed for the use of the committee?

Mr. SAUNDERS. For the use of the committee only at present.

Mr. THURMAN. I think that is a mistake. I think if the testimony is to be printed, the usual number for the use of the Senate should be printed.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I have no objection to printing the usual number.

Mr. THURMAN. Every Senator will want to see that testimony.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will state to the Senator from Ohio that the object of hurrying up the printing is because three members of the committee were not present at the taking of the testimony. They are very anxious to see what has been done, and the only way is to get the slips so as to see what the testimony is. I have no objection to printing the usual number.

Mr. THURMAN. If that is not done now, there may be two prints of the same document, at double the cost to the Government.

Mr. SAUNDERS. No, sir; it is arranged and understood by the members of the committee on the part of the House that they would not present it in the House, but that it should only be presented here. That is fully understood.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Upon the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, and by consent of the Senator from Nebraska, the resolution will be amended so as to print the usual number for the use of the Senate, and as thus amended the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. MATTHEWS. As there appears not to be any more business germane to the morning hour, I now move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 942, being the bill known as the Texas Pacific Railroad bill, in order to discuss it. I desire to address the Senate upon it, and to have it taken up for the purpose of having it considered.

Mr. WITHERS. Do I understand the Senator to say that his wish is merely to address the Senate upon the subject?

Mr. MATTHEWS. I do.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 942) amendatory of and supplementary to the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, and the several acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. President, at the proper time in the progress of this bill toward its final disposition, I shall desire to submit certain amendments to it for the purpose of making it conform precisely to a similar bill pending now in the House of Representatives. They do not, however, affect the substance of the bill; and the remarks which I have prepared upon it are on the bill as I propose that it shall be amended.

Mr. President, Congress has already determined, by deliberate and considered acts of legislation, that national interests require the construction of an additional transcontinental railway, connecting the valley of the Mississippi with the Pacific coast, on or near the thirty-second parallel of latitude. It has not only conferred the requisite authority for the execution of the enterprise, but has made a large and valuable grant of public lands in its aid. By the act of March 3, 1871, the Texas Pacific Railroad Company was incorporated, with authority and power to construct its railroad from Marshall, in the State of Texas, thence by the best line, near the thirty-second parallel of latitude, to El Paso; thence through New Mexico and Arizona to the Colorado River, near the southeastern boundary of California; thence by the most direct and eligible route to ship-channel in the bay of San Diego.

The capital stock of the company was fixed at $50,000,000, and it was empowered to consolidate with any railroad company theretofore chartered under national, State, or territorial laws, authorized to build a railroad on the prescribed route, with one significant exception, as follows:

But no such consolidation shall be with any competing through line of railroads to the Pacific Ocean.

The act also required uniformity of dealing with all connecting roads, and that the rates charged upon the trunk line should not exceed those that might be fixed by Congress over the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroads. It was declared to be a military and post road, with the right on the part of the Government to the preference in its use, at fair and reasonable rates of compensation, not to exceed the price paid by private parties for the same kind of service.

The company was required to prosecute the construction of its road so as to secure its completion within ten years from the passage of the act, and "upon failure to so complete it," the act declares, "Congress may adopt such measures as it may deem necessary and proper to secure its speedy completion."

For the purpose of connecting the main line with the city of San Francisco, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of California was by the same act authorized, subject to the laws of California, to construct a line of railroad from a point at or near Tehachafa Pass, by way of Los Angeles, to the Texas Pacific Railroad at or near the Colorado River, upon the terms prescribed by the act of Congress July 27, 1866.

The name of the corporation was changed by the amendatory act of May 2, 1872, to that of the "Texas and Pacific Railroad Company," and the period for its completion extended to ten years from that date.

This corporation became the successor by consolidation to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of Texas, the Memphis, El Paso and Pacific Railroad Company, and the Southern Transcontinental Railway Company, corporations created by the State of Texas, and secured to itself valuable franchises and land grants in aid of its object, derived from the liberal legislation of that State. This legislation, in the act of May 24, 1871, recites that "the speedy construction of said railway through the State of Texas would greatly enhance the value of the public lands, develop the mineral resources of the State, and give protection and security to the frontier by expelling therefrom the bands of hostile Indians by whom the western settlements are now continually scourged," and declares the grants to be made "in order to secure and promote the speedy construction of a railway through the State of Texas to the Pacific Ocean and thereby secure the incidental advantages of cheap transportation for immigrants to the western and unsettled portions of the State, facility of communication between the eastern and western boundaries, the settlement and enhancement in value of the now unoccupied public domain, and the development of the great mineral, agricultural, and stock-raising resources of the State."

Under the authority and encouragement of this legislation, State and national, the Texas and Pacific Railway Company has acquired and constructed a railway extending from Shreveport in Louisiana to Fort Worth, and from Marshall to Texarkana, and Texarkana to Sherman, making a total length of main track of 444 miles. The construction and equipment of this road, including, however, all the expenditures for survey and location of 1,457 miles of line west from Fort Worth, and for construction work and material on line in California and between Sherman and Fort Worth, represent a cost of $26,540,239.61, of which $7,018,500 is in capital stock and the remainder in mortgage bonds. The gross earnings of this portion of the line for the past year, ending May 31, 1878, is officially reported at $2,331,310.35, from which was derived a net revenue of $729,691.59, sufficient to pay all interest charges except upon land-grant bonds, and leave a surplus of $50,088.88. The sources of income, of course, are purely local.

Under the provisions of the pending bill, the Texas and Pacific Railway Company is required to construct and put in operation at least one hundred miles of its line from its present terminus at Fort Worth westwardly, and commencing at San Diego within six months build and equip at least fifty miles eastwardly within two years after its acceptance of the act, and not less than two hundred miles every two years thereafter, and to complete a continuous railway between Fort Worth and San Diego within six years from the same date.

The bill further provides that the rates for the carriage of through freight and passengers, agreed upon from time to time, between this company and connecting companies, shall be fair and reasonable, and not at any time to exceed the rates charged by competing lines for similar business; and it is expressly stipulated that—

Congress shall at all times have the right to regulate rates for the transportation of such freight and passengers and for postal and telegraphic service over the entire lines of the Texas and Pacific Railway Company and over the entire lines of connecting companies claiming privileges under the provisions of this act, and may exercise a general supervision and control, so far as it shall be necessary so to do, in the interest of the Government of the United States, to secure prompt transportation for its own wants and for the public, and to protect the actual capital invested, and all liabilities of the Government for guarantee of interest made under this act.

It is also prescribed in the second section of the bill that all the lines of railway connecting, or which may hereafter connect, with the Texas and Pacific Railway, shall be put on an equality as to all consigned through business passing either way; and no unjust discrimination in charges for freight or passengers shall be made by or against either, but no higher charges per mile for passengers and per ton per mile for freight shall be made for the haul to and from the junction of such lines than shall be charged on similar business from such junction on its own line; and all freight and passengers shall be forwarded in either direction as consigned; and except as to the ownership and general management of such connecting roads and the division of earnings, said roads shall be operated so as practically to form one line and secure to each railroad company and to the public the accommodation and advantages of a through line at all points of junction; and to make this principle effective, the right is secured to each line forming such a connection to contract currently, at the existing and established rates, for the transportation of freights and passengers to and from the road of either, and to that end to issue through bills of lading and passenger tickets, and to maintain agencies on the line or at the termini of either road for such purposes, thus affording privileges and facilities for transacting such business at such points equal to those enjoyed by the company owning the road, with further provisions authorizing the specific execution of these stipulations when violated, by judicial process.

These provisions apply to the entire road of the Texas and Pacific Railway Company, as well that portion already constructed and now in operation as that which it is proposed to construct under the authority and with the aid of the present bill.

The eastern terminus of the road is fixed by the bill upon the east bank of the Mississippi River, authority being given to cross that stream by a bridge, the actual terminus to be established by five commissioners, three of whom are required to be engineer officers of the Army, and all to be without interest in the location, whose duty it shall be to examine the various proposed routes between the Mississippi River and the present constructed road of the Texas and Pacific Railway Company; and after considering all questions of distance, cost, and transportation routes, in view of foreign as well as domestic trade and commerce, and also in view of an eligible connection with the Atlantic seaboard, to report their judgment as to the most suitable point of connection with the Mississippi River, but not to be farther north than the city of Memphis; which report, if approved by the President of the United States, shall be final and conclusive.

This extension of the present constructed road is then to be built, without delay, at the rate of fifty miles per annum, without any aid from the Government; and in case its own bonds are issued to raise the means for that purpose, secured by mortgage, it is provided that it shall not be a lien upon any property, franchise, or security pledged as an indemnity to the Government for the guarantee of interest on the bonds issued to construct any portion of the line between Fort Worth and San Diego. It is also declared, that a failure to provide for this eastern extension shall work an absolute forfeiture of all right to the guarantee of the Government on the interest of the bonds to be issued for so much of the line as may remain unconstructed at the time of such default.

The length of the unconstructed portion of the road, between Fort Worth and San Diego, as located, is stated to be 1,400 miles, of which 1,150 miles are through the plain or open country and 250 miles through rough or mountainous country.

To raise the capital necessary to build this part of the road the company is authorized to execute two series of bonds, one to be denominated Issue A to the extent of $20,000 per mile for 1,150 miles of road through the plain country, and to the extent of $35,000 per mile for 250 miles through the mountainous country, not to exceed in the aggregate $31,750,000: the other to be denominated Issue B to the extent of $5,000 per mile for the whole distance of 1,400 miles, not exceeding in the aggregate $7,000,000, or $38,750,000 of both series. These bonds are to be made payable in coin fifty years after date with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum payable semi-annually. They are to be secured by a mortgage upon the road to be constructed with their proceeds, which shall be a first lien, and additionally by the following provisions:

1. The land grant under the act of March 3, 1871, of lands in the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona and the State of California, is relinquished to the United States in trust that the reservation may be opened to immediate settlement, the lands sold by the Government and the proceeds of the sales of the lands embraced in the grant applied to the payment, first, of accruing interest upon the bonds, and, second, to the accumulation of a sinking fund for their purchase and redemption.

2. All the earnings of the company over this portion of the road, derived from transportation of troops and supplies and other Government transportation, and for its postal and telegraphic service, and which would otherwise be payable by the Government, shall be retained by it and applied to the payment of current interest and the sinking fund.

3. Any deficiency then remaining, either in the interest fund or in the sinking fund, commencing with the year 1888, of 1 per cent. per annum in coin on the whole amount of bonds issued and outstanding shall be made good out of the general net earnings of the portion of the road mortgaged to secure these bonds.

To the extent to which it may be necessary to issue them for the purposes expressed in the bill, but not in excess of the maximum already mentioned, it is provided that there shall be indorsed on each bond so issued by the Secretary of the Treasury for and in the name of the United States a guarantee to the holder of the prompt payment at maturity by the United States of the interest coupons attached, being at the rate of 5 per cent. in coin, on the 1st day of April and October of each year, as the same shall mature, until the maturity of the bond, but no longer.

The guarantee does not extend to interest accruing after the maturity of the bond, nor to any portion of the principal; and the Government liability for such guarantee of interest cannot exceed $1,937,500 yearly, during the currency of the bonds.

The whole amount of both series of bonds, when executed, are to be deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury, to be issued only by him.

Whenever ten or more consecutive miles of any portion of its lines of railroad and telegraph between Fort Worth and San Diego Bay have been constructed and are ready for service with equipment, sidings, buildings, and other appurtenances necessary for the business, according to the Government standard, as required from the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroad Companies, the actual cost thereof, as ascertained by commissioners under oath, appointed by the President, shall be reported, and thereupon the Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver to the company for road so constructed and equipped in the plain or open country, bonds of Issue A, guaranteed as prescribed by the bill, at the rate of not exceeding an average of $20,000 per mile for 1,150 miles, and for the other portions of the road constructed and equipped in the rough or mountainous country for 250 miles such bonds at the rate not exceeding an average of $35,000 per mile; but it is provided that if it be found, from time to time, that a less number of bonds than those stipulated to be indorsed for delivery to construct and equip the whole line will provide sufficient money to meet such expenditures, then the number of bonds to be delivered shall be correspondingly reduced and all bonds not actually required to pay for the actual cost of construction as thus ascertained shall be retained in the Treasury of the United States, not to be issued, except as subsequently provided.

The bonds denominated Issue B, amounting to $5,000 per mile, it is provided shall be retained in the Treasury, and in case the net proceeds of sales of lands, with the Government transportation, telegraph and postal service, and the earnings of the road, as previously provided, shall not equal the amount to be deposited for interest by the company, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell a sufficient number of such retained guaranteed bonds of Issue B and to use the proceeds of such sales to make up any such deficiency; a provision inserted to supply a possible temporary want of revenue to meet accruing interest during the period of construction, and effectually to guard against the necessity of any advance by the Government on account of its guarantee.

When the earnings and revenues of the company from all sources, after the completion of the whole line, shall be sufficient to pay all interest guaranteed by the Government, the bonds so retained and not sold shall be issued only for the purpose of additional construction and permanent improvement, upon proof by the certificates of the commissioners that such expenditures are required by the increasing business of the company, all such additional property becoming a part of the mortgaged premises.

The scheme for public aid to this national highway is unique, and certainly reduces the possible liability of the Government to the minimum. It differs altogether, both in kind and degree, from that granted toward the construction of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific line. A comparison of the two is in reality a contrast, and the contrast is greatly in favor of the present proposition, when estimated, in view of the liability of loss to the Government in virtue of its engagements. In the case of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific line the Government made a direct advance of its own bonds to an amount double that now proposed, without any provision for payments on account of current interest, except to the extent of one-half the earnings of the roads from Government transportation and 5 per cent. of the net earnings, without provision for a sinking fund, without security for ultimate payment of the principal and accrued interest, except a second mortgage, subject to a prior lien for an equal amount, without reference to the actual cost of construction, and without reservation of power over the rates of transportation, until it appears that the net earnings of the road and telegraph, including the amount allowed for services rendered for the United States, after deducting all expenditures, including repairs and the furnishing, running, and managing the road, shall exceed 10 per cent. upon its cost, exclusive of the 5 per cent. to be paid to the United States.

Under these provisions the Government has contracted an unconditional liability for a principal sum of $64,623,512, on which it pays an annual interest of $3,877,000, the accumulations of which, added to the principal sum, already amount to near $100,000,000.

Under the pending bill, the Government issues no bonds of its own, and becomes bound to pay none issued by others. It simply guarantees the payment of the annual interest to an amount less than $2,000,000 per annum during the currency of the bonds, and holds as indemnity the whole capital of the road, represented in the value of its construction, with all its revenue and income, secured by the lien of a mortgage, which legislation cannot displace without the consent of every individual bondholder; a road in the construction of which the Government has taken ample pains to assure itself that not a dollar has been made by way of speculation.

As the mortgage to be given by the company specifically and expressly secures the payment to the United States of the interest as it matures, it is manifest from this statement that the indemnity to the Government against ultimate loss is perfect. Its lien under the mortgage has priority over that given to the holder of the bonds for the principal sum, and ultimate loss by the Government is rendered impossible, unless it can be supposed that the road itself, when built, will not be worth the amount of the accruing interest on its cost after sinking the whole amount of the capital. Such a supposition certainly is not admissible.

The demonstration, however, on this point can be made still more complete and satisfactory. It is not, perhaps, sufficient to show that the ultimate security to the Government for reimbursement is ample. The point to be established is, that in addition to this there is no rational probability that the Government will be called upon to make any advances out of its own Treasury on account of its liability on the proposed guarantee. The utmost extent, as has already been stated, of this liability is the annual sum of $1,937,500, and that is upon the supposition that all the bonds authorized shall have been actually issued; and the question is, whether the whole of the net earnings of 1,400 miles of road from Fort Worth to San Diego, after completion, including the whole gross earnings on account of Government transportation, military and civil, with the proceeds of the sales of lands included in the land grant, will be sufficient for that purpose. To do so, laying out of the question all consideration of land sales, will require annual net earnings from this part of the line of but $1,312 per mile. The average net earnings per mile of road already completed and operated by the company for three years ending May 31, 1878, according to the official reports were $1,908, an excess over the required amount of $596 per mile; and that, without the benefit of anything but local business, earned by a mere fraction of the road not connected with either of its proposed termini, and without any business naturally belonging to it as a new transcontinental line. The fact that during the past year the Union and Central Pacific Railroad Companies earned an average of more than $12,500 per mile is, after making every allowance, an absolute assurance of safety; for, indeed, there is no reason to believe that the earnings of a new route to the Pacific on the thirty-second parallel will not, after completion, both presently and prospectively, by progressive development approximate equality with those of other lines with which it will compete for through business. As to a division of the through traffic and travel, there can be no doubt whatever. It is a matter of competition and settled upon the adjustment of rates. In regard to the development of local business, the experience of the existing lines takes away the opportunity for surprise, as there is nothing in the region traversed by the southern line that will furnish reason for any difference in this respect. And there are two circumstances characteristic of and peculiar to the proposed line that at least may be counted on to counterbalance any supposed disadvantages.

The first of these is that its construction is a completion, on the line of its own latitude, of a complete system of railroads in the States east of the Mississippi River, connecting with Atlantic and Gulf ports and intermediate points and sections, which must naturally find it to be their interest to become feeders to the Texas and Pacific Railway and all whose influence will be exerted in its favor. On the other hand, the cities of the northern Atlantic seaboard, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, now receiving and sending their transcontinental traffic by other because the only existing lines, will find it to their own interest to compete with rival cities by dividing their own patronage with the southern line. The balance of advantage from this source will plainly be with the new line of transportation.

The second and more important of these circumstances is that the Texas and Pacific Railroad, skirting as it does the southern boundary of the United States, in proximity with rich mineral and agricultural provinces of old Mexico, will form a base line, from and to which lateral lines of trade and travel will speedily radiate, penetrating across the border and attracting a new and most profitable trade. The states of Chihuahua, Sonora, Coahuila, Sinoloa, and Durango will almost immediately be tributary to it; and it cannot be long before a market will be found, by means of this transit, for the productions of the United States in every portion of our sister republic. The natural entrance to its capital and center is southwardly from El Paso, via Chihuahua, Durango, Zacatecas, Lagos, and Guanajuato, to the City of Mexico, toward which, by a gradual ascent, the topography of the country invites approach and access. The key to this whole region and its entire trade, present and future, is El Paso, on the line of a railroad connecting it with both oceans and the civilization, capital, and commerce of every section of the United States. Nor can it reasonably be objected that this prospect is remote. The adjacent states of Mexico are inhabited by a population which, if rude and uncultivated, yet nevertheless are not savage, and have established some of the habits and industries of civilized life, and are ready, as soon as the projected railroad can be built, to bring to it from considerable distances, over natural roads, the products of their labor to exchange for the manufactures of this country.

The general influence exerted by the existence and operations of such a line of trade and travel upon our international relations with Mexico would necessarily be powerful and of the most beneficial character, though the present occasion does not seem suitable for enlarging upon it. As a defense in time of war it would be equal to an army or a line of forts, but far more valuable in the preservation of peace by cultivating its arts and removing the temptations and occasions of hostility. And that it would open, by legitimate and acceptable modes, the northern states of Mexico to industrial colonies, emigrating from our own more populous districts, will not be questioned by those who have faith in the manifest destiny of the Anglo-American people to occupy and rule this continent, nor that such a settlement and the consequent development of the resources and riches of that region would be fruitful in good and peaceful results to all the inhabitants of the land.

But the present question is much narrower and more definite. It is simply this: whether this road, when constructed, will be able, by means of its entire net revenue, to pay the guaranteed interest on the cost of its construction, so as to insure the Government against any advance on account of its liability. It is a mere question of dollars and cents, and in the light of our own experience, in the history of Pacific railway enterprises, a matter of simple calculation. And the conclusion is incontrovertible, that the single items of revenue derivable from the Government itself, on account of military, Indian, postal, and telegraphic service, together with the sums now expended on those accounts, which will be saved by the economy of transportation, will be more than sufficient to meet the Government guarantee. Of course, no estimate exactly accurate can now be made of the necessary future expenditures and savings of the Government on these accounts; but we can approximate the result, within sure limits, by a comparison of known facts. We can compare the actual allowances and payments made by the Government to the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Companies for similar services, and the expenditures now made for such as are required in other ways to be performed, but of like character, on the proposed line of the Texas and Pacific Railroad, and which, on its completion, would be rendered by it.

On this point the committee of the present House of Representatives, in their report on the subject, say:

> As a simple measure of economy, the Government, in the management of its military, Indian, and postal affairs, could well afford to expend more in the construction of the line proposed by this bill than it is asked to guarantee. The rates of transportation charged on the present Pacific connection are admitted on all sides to be high. Yet the reports of the Quartermaster-General show that the saving to the Government on that line, in railroad, over the former mode of transportation by wagons, has been 75 per cent., and that for the two years preceding June 30, 1874, this saving amounted to about $2,000,000 per annum. Now, when this fact is taken into account, that between thirty and forty military posts and eleven regiments of United States soldiers, nearly half the entire Army, would draw their supplies from the Texas Pacific Railway; and the further fact that during the years 1865, 1866, and 1867, the Government actually paid $16,627,922.47, or more than five and a half millions annually, for maintaining a military force in Arizona and New Mexico, not including the expense of Indian agencies, supplies, or transportation of mails and stores, the conclusion is irresistible and unanswerable, that the Government would save more than the maximum liability to be assumed under the provisions of this bill.

It appears by a report made to the Senate by its Committee on Pacific Railroads, at the third session of the Fortieth Congress, on February 19, 1869, that the amount of Government transportation performed on the Kansas Pacific line from the time it commenced doing business, October 16, 1866, to January 1, 1869, during which the Government's use of the line averaged less than two hundred and twenty miles, was exactly $1,033,569.94.

The report of the House committee, from which an extract has been read, probably estimates too largely the number of military posts that would be supplied by the Texas and Pacific Railroad when completed. Moderating that estimate by reducing it to eighteen posts, embracing only about three thousand men and officers, or one-eighth of the Army, and it is calculated that upon the single item of transporting supplies, leaving out of the calculation the movement of the troops themselves, there would be an annual saving of $130,000. Adding to this the cost of transporting the troops when their movement is necessary, the reduction of expense by the increased efficiency of the troops, by dispatch of movement, dispensing with a large proportion of their numbers, and the cost of Government transportation on account of the Indian service and postal and telegraphic service, and it will hardly be denied that the aggregate will not fall below the maximum amount of the Government guarantee.

The following statement and tables, furnished from the Interior Department by the Auditor of Railroad Accounts, show the amounts paid each year from the opening of the roads by the Government to the Union Pacific, the Kansas Pacific, and Central Pacific Railroads for Government service:

They show that in a little less than twelve years the Government has paid to these roads, forming in fact but one line, on account of services rendered to it in the transportation of Government freight and troops and for the mails, the aggregate sum of $13,807,430.99, or at the rate per annum of $1,317,285.91.

In view of these considerations and the facts upon which they are based, I submit, Mr. President, that it is not fair or just to the present measure to dispose of it upon the summary objection that it proposes a subsidy. I am quite well aware that that word is supposed to be powerful as a spell—to be a name with which to conjure—that it conveys an odious imputation sufficient to frighten away all self-respecting support from any proposal to which it is applied; but, sir, it can hardly be regarded as the part of either wisdom or courage to shrink from the advocacy of any right cause lest it be confounded by ignorance or malice, or even through honest misconception, with something different that is wrong. Much less is there manliness in cowering before an apparition which is created by our own imaginary apprehensions, or in fleeing from the pursuit of the phantoms of our own fears.

In the present instance the word is altogether misapplied. In its odious sense the proposition of the bill has no single feature of a subsidy. It involves nothing but what falls within the usual and legitimate scope and province of our limited constitutional Government. It is not a bounty to any private interest. It is the execution of a trust and function purely public, and solely upon grounds and motives of public interest. It is not more a subsidy than is a most necessary appropriation of public money to the improvement of a river or harbor. The agency of a corporate body is employed, not for its own sake and benefit, but simply because it is the best and most convenient instrument to perform the obligation of the Government. The National Government charters a system of national banks and endows them with franchises and enables them to employ, to their own profit, the public credit, but it would be a misnomer to nickname this valuable privilege a subsidy because it is the chosen means to render an equivalent public service.

There are some, no doubt, who sincerely believe that it is beyond the province, not merely of the National Government under the Constitution, but of government itself, even when unlimited except by its essential nature and purposes, to extend its powers and means beyond the simplest protection of individual personal rights. But that is not my creed. I believe government is something larger and deeper than that; that its limits are not to be defined by right lines; that it is the wisdom and strength of all, for all the common purposes of social life which in their nature or by reason of special circumstances cannot be compassed by individual and several action; that our Constitution is the frame of a perpetual government, which interprets itself by its adaptation to the life and growth of a people whose destiny is greater than any of their existing institutions, and that it is to be construed strictly, indeed, as against public and private rights, but liberally for their promotion, in order that it may not fail of any of the benevolent purposes for which it was ordained.

The construction of this additional highway across the continent, in my judgment, is a great, distinctive, national work. There is not a cherished object for which we can imagine ourselves to exist as a nation to which it is not a valuable auxiliary. It is a measure of national defense, and better than an army, a navy, or fortifications. It is a measure of peace upon our border with a people with whom, although our nearest neighbors, we live in a condition of constant irritation, and yet with whom we ought to have the most intimate and mutually profitable relations of friendly commerce. It is a measure of civilization to the Indians in our Southern and Western States and Territories, not only by concentrating our power of forcible subjection, but bringing them within easy reach of the influences which must either change their habits to those of civilized life or hasten their extermination. It is a measure of domestic empire, binding together by multiplied ties the interests of our Atlantic and Pacific coasts. It is a measure of commerce between the States, furnishing new markets to regions not able fairly to share in the communications which have been heretofore established, and who have a fair right to demand a development, to national proportions, of their local resources, and to establish upon their own lines of latitude, the course of emigration and trade. It is a measure of commerce with foreign nations, opening a new highway, under national regulation, to the growing traffic with the world beyond our western seas, emancipated from the shackles of a monopoly and solving for the continent the great problem of cheap transportation, yielding to capital enough, but exacting from productions no more than, under the supervision and guardianship of the Government itself, shall, from time to time, be found adequate to a healthy equilibrium between the great forces of production and distribution.

It is this feature which makes the present proposition unique and gives to it its chief value and significance. The bill secures to Congress, in unequivocal terms, the right to regulate rates for the transportation of through freight and passengers and for postal and telegraphic service, not merely over that portion of the line constructed under the provisions of the bill, but over the entire lines of the Texas and Pacific Railway, including that portion now in operation, and over the entire lines of connecting companies claiming privileges under the provisions of the bill, and the right to exercise a general supervision and control, so far as it shall be necessary so to do in the interest of the Government of the United States, to secure prompt transportation for its own wants and for the public, and to protect the actual capital invested and all liabilities of the Government for guarantee of interest made under the act.

The guarantee of earnings sufficient to pay the interest on the cost of construction is the natural and necessary corollary from the reservation of the unlimited control over the prices of transportation. For it is manifest that without an equivalent guarantee private capital could not put itself at the mercy of arbitrary control in the hands of its customers with adverse interests. Certainly none can be found with private means to build such a road, giving up the right to a voice in determining whether its operations shall be conducted at a profit or a loss. But if the Government reserves the power to dictate rates, it has also created an interest in behalf of the public, which it represents by its own guarantee of net income sufficient to pay the interest on the capital invested in the actual cost of construction, to maintain rates so as to indemnify itself.

It is from overlooking the fact of this provision and underestimating its value that has led to a misapprehension of the attitude toward this project of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of California, inducing a belief in some quarters that it proposed and stood ready to carry forward into complete execution this scheme of a new competing Pacific Railroad without aid from the Government. This is altogether a mistake. I know of no such offer. The Southern Pacific Railroad Company of California, in connection with the Central Pacific Railroad Company of that State, has built a railroad to Fort Yuma, has crossed the military reservation at that point and the Colorado River into Arizona, and is reported to be proceeding, without congressional authority certainly, but under laws of that Territory, to Maricopa Wells, in a direction apparently tending to El Paso, and professing the intention to construct to that point; whether for the purpose there of making a railroad connection, under a Texas charter, to Galveston and New Orleans, or whether intending to diverge before reaching El Paso, so as to meet the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé Railroad at Albuquerque or Casa Colorado, is the subject at present of conjecture merely.

But what that company has done, or is now doing and may hereafter do, is altogether immaterial, and for this reason: that, whatever it may do or intend, it does not mean to construct or to aid in the construction of a transcontinental railway which shall compete for business or in rates with the existing line from San Francisco to Omaha. More than this seems to be the intent, and that is, that whatever it is engaged in doing has at least for one of its purposes that of defeating and preventing the construction and operation of the Texas and Pacific Railroad as a free and open highway competing for the through trade and travel between the oceans, subject to the unlimited regulation of Congress and at rates to be from time to time established by it in the sole interest of the Government and people of the United States And the sacrifices the Southern and Central Pacific Railroad Companies show themselves willing to make to that end in the construction of lines which they shall continue to control in the interest of their present monopoly is the measure of what they fear from the establishment of an open competition by means of the Texas and Pacific Railroad. The evil they fear to their own interests is precisely equal to the public good which it means and measures. If those who plan and labor for public interests alone were a match in clear-sightedness and zeal for those who plan and labor for their private and personal ends, the enthusiasm in behalf of the pending bill would be at least equal to the energy and determination displayed by its rivals to defeat it.

I impute to the great corporations now in possession and control of the sole highway to the Pacific, and to their able and powerful managers, no motives and designs with any vice not inherent in human nature itself, nor charge them with deliberately and consciously seeking a private benefit at the expense of a manifest public good. It is quite likely that they believe the interests of the whole nation can be best subserved by measures which they devise for the promotion of their own, for no mistake is more easily fallen into than to substitute our own for the public good.

But what I believe and affirm is, that these companies and their managers are determined, if possible, to preoccupy the ground and forestall the action of Congress, in order that, by defeating as unnecessary the pending proposition, they may be left in the undisturbed possession and enjoyment of the right to tax, according to the demands of their own interests, the vast volume of transcontinental trade and traffic which enriches their treasury and enables them to build up breastworks against competition.

Let those who are unwilling to emancipate this enormous public interest from the burden of this ever-growing mortgage by the construction of a line which shall be the servant and not the master of this trade, for fear of the popular condemnation of subsidies, reflect upon the ten-fold greater subsidy which they vote to the existing lines by perpetuating their monopoly and securing to them permanently the right and power of dictating the terms upon which they will perform the public duty for which they were created. It is a strange and incongruous spectacle that a popular jealousy against subsidies and corporate privileges should be invoked against a measure the very object of which is, and whose effect must certainly be, to curb and restrain monopoly built upon subsidy, and in behalf of corporate power more potent and exacting than any ever before known in our history.

Some idea of its capacity to prey upon the commerce it was intended to foster and facilitate may be gathered from the fact that the joint management of the present Pacific roads is able to exact $2,400 a car load of ten tons of what it is pleased to style double first-class freight from every shipper who is unwilling to agree to give to its line, as against the ocean route by steamship or sailing vessel, the whole of his freight in all seasons. It would be better, as a matter of pecuniary profit to the people, that the Government should at once release these roads from the obligation to repay their indebtedness to it, in consideration of a concession of the right to regulate their tariff of charges. The excess that might reasonably be thus reduced would be cheaply capitalized at the amount of the debt, large as it is. It would be better still to establish a competition by the construction of a new road, subject to the regulation of the Government, which, in its turn, upon the principle of competition, would be the regulator of all its rivals. At the worst, it is but the transfer of an investment now employed as a means of injury and oppression to the trade of the whole country into an instrument for its emancipation.

How effective an instrument for that purpose the Texas and Pacific Railroad might and would be is made manifest by a comparison between the cost of its construction with that of the existing lines; for it is evident that the reasonable cost of transportation will be lessened by whatever lessens the cost of the indispensable means of effecting it. If the existing roads could be replaced by others at much less than their original and present cost, of course the new substitutes could afford, making equal profits upon the investment, to perform the same service at a proportionably less charge; and if a competing road can be built at a less cost than that of existing lines, it is evident that the new and cheaper road, can dictate the rates for its rivals.

A comparison between the existing lines from the Mississippi River at Rock Island, to San Francisco, by Omaha, and the proposed line of the Texas and Pacific Railroad, as to the cost of construction and operation, will show the following results:

The length of the Texas and Pacific Railroad, constructed and to be constructed, according to the provisions of this bill, from the Mississippi River to San Diego, is 1,807 miles at the longest distance; that of the line on the forty-first parallel, from Rock Island to San Francisco, is 2,227 miles; a difference of 360 miles in favor of that now proposed.

The difference in the cost of construction is much more marked. On the northern line it is for 2,277 miles $251,613,924, which is an average of $112,983 per mile. On the Texas and Pacific line, estimating for the cost of the longest extension to the Mississippi River, it will be $64,172,000, or an average of but $36,316 per mile. This is less than one-third the average cost of the present line and is an aggregate saving for the whole line of $186,441,924, or $76,667 per mile of road.

This average of $36,316 is nearly $10,000 per mile in excess of the estimated cost of the new road to be constructed, because it includes the higher average of the constructed portion east of Fort Worth, built during the period of high prices and under great disadvantages for the transportation of material, and also the whole amount of the $7,000,000 of bonds to be retained by the United States, a part only of which it is believed will be actually issued. And to complete the transit from San Diego to San Francisco a steamship plant of five or six first-class steamers could be created at a cost not exceeding $3,000,000, which, in addition to the Arizona, New Mexican, and transcontinental traffic, would accommodate all the coast business between San Diego and San Francisco.

But adding the cost of the Southern Pacific Railroad of California as a branch of the Texas and Pacific Railroad from Fort Yuma, to make an all-rail connection with San Francisco, which is for 720 miles $67,299,120, and we have the aggregate cost of the entire line $131,471,120, which is still $120,142,804 less than the cost of the present line via Omaha.

That the cost of operating the Texas and Pacific line will be less than that of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific is manifest from various considerations. The distance, as we have seen, is 360 miles in favor of the former. In addition, the difference in the character of the roads, as to curves and grades, is still more in its favor. By the Texas and Pacific line the divide of the continent is crossed at an elevation of 4,893 feet on very light grades, not exceeding 66 feet to the mile, while on the entire line the total length of grades between 80 and 105 feet will not exceed 45 miles, and between 66 and 80 feet, 72 miles. The maximum gradient, except at a few points, is not more than 66 feet to the mile. The extreme elevation upon the line is 5,027 feet, against 8,235 feet upon the Union Pacific and 6,988 feet upon the Central Pacific road; the total ascent and descent being 38,245 feet, against 54,812 feet on the other line. This difference of altitude of itself constitutes a difference of climate, with the natural result of a line which is free from obstruction by snow at all seasons of the year, forming the natural highway across the continent, as well as the shortest that can be constructed within United States territory between the two oceans.

What verge and room there is for a reduction in the tolls levied by way of transportation charges upon the commerce carried across the continent is to be seen most conspicuously by a review of the progressive increase of rates for the past three years as established by the present line.

The tariff of these companies in force previous to March 4, 1875, shows that their through freight rates between New York and San Francisco were on first-class goods $3.25 per one hundred pounds; on second-class goods, $2 per one hundred pounds; on third-class goods, $1.90 per one hundred pounds; on fourth-class goods, $1.80 per one hundred pounds, with special rates as against sailing-vessels around Cape Horn for low-grade freights running from $1.40 to $1.70 per one hundred pounds.

In that month, immediately after the adjournment of Congress, a bill to secure the completion of the Texas and Pacific Railway having failed, and the Pacific mail steamship subsidy act having been repealed, a new tariff of freight rates between New York and San Francisco was issued, by which first-class freights were raised to $5 per one hundred pounds; and on the 29th of the same month the rates were increased to $6 for first class, $5 for second class, $4 for third class, and $3 for fourth class.

These rates nominally have continued in force until the present time; but by a circular issued by the companies, a copy of which I have examined, dated July 29, 1878, and issued since the adjournment of Congress at its last session, notice is given of very important changes in the classification of merchandise, affecting the rates of freight in a very remarkable degree. The following are examples:

Blankets, which, in the regular published freight tariff of February 28, 1878, are rated as second class, under the circular of July 29 are declared to be double first class, and when shipped in bales, under written release, at one-and-a-half times first-class rates.

Organs, melodeons, and pianos, boxed, are changed from first class to one-and-a-half times first class.

Ribbons, &c., changed from first class to double first class.

So canvas, clothing, comfortables, cotton bags and bagging, and many other articles are changed from first and second class to double first class. By that change, first-class goods, instead of paying on a ten-ton car load at $6 per one hundred pounds, amounting to $1,200, would pay $2,640, and even that double rate is to be doubled upon any excess of twenty-two hundred pounds loaded in any car by the shipper.

No exhibit other than this is needed to account for the fact that, while during the past years of business depression all other railroads in the country have shared the losses of the community, many having struggled in vain to earn the interest on their indebtedness and but few able to pay dividends to their stockholders, the net earnings and profits of these companies have enabled them, even on a decreased volume of business, for the year ending June 30, 1878, to declare and pay as dividends—the Union Pacific, $2,204,700; the Central Pacific, $1,342,040; as appears by the official report of the Secretary of the Interior, just laid on our table.

Mr. President, I do not envy these companies their wealth and power. I do not refer to these facts to excite hostility to their prosperity. I do not accuse them of any illegality. I do not invoke against them any legislation to deprive them of any of their just rights. I do not even think it would be legitimate for Congress to exert its acknowledged power to take from them the fruit of any reasonable expectation. But a mere description of these privileges and opportunities includes the conviction of an inevitable abuse of their powers. Irresponsible authority lodged in a corporate body organized for the profit of its members never has failed and never will fail of being abused. It ought to be counteracted and checked, and that can best be done by setting in healthful activity the wholesome and corrective principle of competition, by the operation of which the keen rivalry and sharp struggle of opposing private interests co-operate for the public good. That sole ground is the sufficient justification for the passage of the pending bill.

Thus far, Mr. President, I have considered the merits of this measure upon grounds of public interest, equally affecting the whole country without any distinction of locality. In respect to the topic first considered, if the construction and operation of this road should have, as it must have, the effect to lighten the present tax upon the transcontinental commerce, that advantage would accrue equally to every part and section of the country. There is not an industry in the land that would not in some degree share in the benefit. Every commercial city and center would feel its influence in quickened productions and a livelier trade; and Boston, New York, and Philadelphia would reap their share of the profit, even though not one of them should ever in fact receive by means of it an additional customer or a single pound of merchandise to their markets. And so also every expected service from which I have derived an argument is one to be rendered to the general good, and not specially to that of any part of the country.

But I should do injustice to my own convictions if I altogether omitted one consideration which I confess has materially contributed to the formation of my favorable opinion of the project.

The Constitution of the United States, while it conferred upon Congress general power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes," has nevertheless deemed it important also to declare that "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another." And this is but one expression and illustration of that spirit of impartiality which pervades the whole frame of the Government. The Constitution knows no section, makes no discrimination between States, and the rule of its administration is equal and exact justice among all its citizens. The Government owes protection to and demands obedience alike from all without distinction of color, creed, or condition, and every power is a trust for the whole and all its parts. Even the incidental advantages arising unavoidably in the exercise of its functions ought to be distributed so as not to excite suspicion of partiality.

The circumstances that led to the location and construction of the present railroad line to the Pacific are well known. The occasion was a national necessity that admitted of no delay and was permitted no choice. There is nothing to regret in the legislation of that day except the want of faith which could not foresee the wonderful success of the enterprise as an investment of capital and which therefore conceded to corporate privilege more than was needed for the public service or advantageous to the public interests.

But it is undeniable that, in point of fact, it has not only caused an unexampled development and growth of the territory the improvement has traversed, but has greatly enriched the lines of transportation and the commercial cities and centers with which it was directly connected. And while it has been of incalculable benefit to the general interests of the country at large, it has also, and quite as conspicuously, conferred special and immensely valuable advantages upon particular localities. It has been the natural and most profitable extension and development of the east and west lines of railroad north of the Ohio River, and contributed to the wealth which a new and rich commerce has brought to the cities, both inland and on the sea-coast, in the line of that trade. That commerce is in its infancy; its growth is certain; its ultimate magnitude beyond all present conception.

The States and Territories on the South Atlantic, the Gulf of Mexico, the Lower Mississippi, and Texas, shall they not participate in its profits? They have their productions, some peculiar to their region, that are wanted in the more distant markets of our continental empire, and in the still more distant markets of the world beyond the seas. They have their own east and west lines of railroad communication connecting the ports and cities of the South Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico with the valley of the Mississippi, and stretching beyond toward the western frontiers of Texas. The undeveloped territories, farther west and in the same latitude, are expecting, with untold treasures of precious ores, the opportunity of settlement and development. Southern California, with her magnificent harbor at San Diego, presents her claim to consideration. As a mere question of commerce, internal and external, and of national internal improvement, the consideration of that justice which consists in the impartial administration and application of the powers and resources of the Government among the material interests of the different parts of the country is conclusive in behalf of the present measure. It is indeed by comparison less than justice, if the rule of justice is equality, and tardy too; indeed the very least that ought to be tendered in satisfaction of its rightful claims.

Mr. President, my interest in this question existed before I had any expectation of ever occupying a seat in this body. In November, 1875, I was one of many delegates representing the commercial bodies of the city of Cincinnati, in a convention called to consider the subject which assembled in the city of Saint Louis. I was unexpectedly to myself called to preside over that large and most respectable body, and as such it was made my duty to prepare an address to the people of the United States expressing the sense of the convention upon the merits of this measure. In doing so, upon the particular topic which I have just presented, I used language which I am willing now and here to adopt. It is as follows:

The line of said road in behalf of which the present appeal is made is intended to connect the entire southern system of railroads—terminating at the Mississippi River and reaching through the interior to the Atlantic—with the Pacific coast. That its construction and completion would put them on an equal footing with the parallel lines to the north, for the transcontinental trade, is quite evident, and that they have a right to expect that equality follows from the character of our Government, as equal and impartial in its administration, discriminating neither for nor against any. That it would rapidly develop the sparsely settled country in the Southwest, and people the Territories between Texas and the Pacific with a tide of emigrants flowing along their accustomed lines of latitude, is equally evident to all who have observed the conditions according to which our borders have advanced toward the west. That it would give new life to the railroad system of the South, by furnishing it its natural and legitimate extension, those most interested will bear unquestionable testimony, a result that of itself would be the sign and consequence of an active and revived industry wherever their lines penetrate. The South would live again, and find a new and better life than ever before in the busy and diversified industry of a contented, because prospering, population. Does not this consideration weigh heavily in the argument for the public aid to this enterprise? We have been waiting long years for the people of the South to forget the calamities of our civil war. Nothing will tend so greatly and so certainly to bury the remembrance of them forever as the rising of that tide of prosperity which is sure to come in upon them, and upon us all, like a flood, when the Government shall stretch out its hands to them to help and not to hurt, and to lend to them for a time, without cost or loss to itself, that public credit which would be so much strengthened and increased by the general prosperity which it will be used to promote. Such a measure would be the great healing act of Federal legislation, giving its assurance that the people of the Union and their common representatives, in the exercise of the public power and the employment of the common wealth, know no sections in the country, no divisions among the people, but are zealous and anxious to exert all their functions, so as equally to promote the growth and prosperity of every part and member.

Mr. President, if considerations of local interest are or ought to have any weight in the determination of this question, there is one which I may be excused for adverting to as naturally having an influence upon my own course as one of the Senators from Ohio. The principal city of that State, the city of Cincinnati, with which my own personal history and interests are identified, is now about completing a railroad to Chattanooga in Tennessee, a distance of a little over three hundred miles. It has already authorized in its construction the expenditure of $18,000,000. The investment, including its equipment, will ultimately represent a capital of over $20,000,000. The work was begun and has been prosecuted by the city in its municipal character and as its sole proprietor. It has been executed under laws of the State, the constitution of which expressly declares that—

The General Assembly shall never authorize any county, city, town, or township, by vote of its citizens or otherwise, to become a stockholder in any joint stock company, corporation, or association whatever; or to raise money for or loan its credit to or in aid of any such company, corporation, or association; the supreme court of the State deciding that the prohibition did not extend to the construction of a railroad by the city itself, that being a public work within the legitimate purposes of municipal organization, even although it is built outside the State itself. The object of the city in this large outlay of money is to secure to itself trade from the railroad system of the South. At Chattanooga it connects immediately with the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, and through it and others with the whole system of railroads which covers with its network the area between the South Atlantic and Gulf coasts and the Mississippi River and west through Texas, as far as it may be extended. Whether the city of Cincinnati shall reap the benefit it has expected from the construction of its own southern road, in which it has so large an interest, direct and indirect, depends upon the prosperous development of the business of that entire southern system of which it has thus become a part. And it is a matter of special and peculiar interest whether it shall, by means of that connection, be permitted to share in the transcontinental and Pacific commerce.

The construction of the Texas and Pacific Railroad will form a line in which its own road will constitute an important link. The value to its manufactures and trade of such a connection, while it would not of itself justify, in my own eyes, my advocacy of the measure, yet, as it coincides with the great and general interests of the whole country that are involved with it, enables me to satisfy my own convictions of duty and at the same time assist in promoting the local interest of those who constitute at least a part of my constituency. It is my strong conviction that, if the present bill becomes a law, as I trust it will, when the great work it proposes to aid shall be constructed and in successful operation, its beneficent influence upon the various and extensive interests, not of the South alone, nor of any particular locality, but of the whole country and of all its parts, will be as universally acknowledged as it will be widely, deeply, and permanently felt, and will amply justify and vindicate those who to-day advocate and support it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill called up by the Senator from Ohio will now resume and retain its place upon the Calendar.

OMISSION IN ENROLLMENT.

Mr. CONOVER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of three Senators, to be appointed by the Chair, be directed to investigate and report to the Senate how or in what manner a section in the bill (H. R. No. 5130) known as the sundry civil bill, relating to the Hot Springs of Arkansas, passed at the last session of Congress, was omitted in the bill as enrolled; whether Senator CONOVER had any connection therewith; whether any officer of the Government, and who, pretended, after the adjournment of the last session of Congress, to investigate the matter; what investigation was made, and what testimony, if any, was taken in that investigation; as well as the testimony to be taken by the said committee; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 4228) to promote the education of the blind; and it was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

DISTRICT SEWERAGE.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, presented a plan for the improvement of the system of sewerage in the District of Columbia, submitted at the invitation of that committee by Gustavus A. Karwiese; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Several executive messages were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at one o'clock and fifty-seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 3, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MORNING HOUR.

Mr. HALE. As there was no morning hour yesterday for the reference of bills and as many gentlemen desire to introduce them for reference, I suggest by unanimous consent a morning hour be allowed to-day for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. Or so much as may be necessary.

Mr. KELLEY. Let it be for the introduction and reference of bills and resolutions.

Mr. HALE. Precisely as the ordinary morning hour, for introduction and reference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the proposition to the House.

Mr. REAGAN. I understand the bill reported from the Committee on Commerce in relation to interstate commerce is the unfinished business before the House, but I will interpose no objection if the morning hour will not interfere with that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will see that bill does not lose any of its rights. It is affected, however, by Rule 136 of the House and by Joint Rule 21, both rules providing that the unfinished business of a preceding session shall not be taken up until after six days of the succeeding session. The Chair of course will recognize the gentleman from Texas at the expiration of that time on the unfinished business to which he refers.

The gentleman from Maine proposes by unanimous consent there shall be allowed a morning hour, as if on Monday, for the purpose of introducing bills and resolutions for reference. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly

Mr. BANNING. Is the call to continue until all the States are gone through with?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands.

PRINTING PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask to introduce the usual joint resolution touching the printing of the President's message.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That 20,000 copies of the President's message with reports of the Departments proper, and without the accompanying documents, be printed for the use of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. That resolution, under the law, will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New York. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to what I deem to be a question of privilege. On the 21st day of June last a gentleman introduced a resolution in relation to war claims. It was put on its passage, and had in the affirmative 24 and in the negative 123 votes; and I was reported on that occasion as being absent or dodging. I was not absent, nor did I withhold my vote, but voted in the negative on that question. I desire the record shall show, if possible, that I was not out of my seat, but was here on that occasion and voted in the negative.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to see how the Journal of the last session of Congress can be corrected, but the object the gentleman has in view is reached by the statement he has just made, as it will go into the RECORD. The Chair desires to say in addition that he knows of no member of the House who during the last session of Congress was more constant in his attendance upon the sessions of the House than the gentleman from New York.

PROCEEDINGS IN MANDAMUS.

Mr. HALE (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5232) to regulate proceedings in mandamus; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

DENNIS SULLIVAN.

Mr. JONES, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5233) granting an increase of pension to Dennis Sullivan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PROPERTY IN CUSTODY OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. HENDEE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5234) authorizing the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury Department to examine and allow claims against the United States for property lost or destroyed while in the custody of postmasters; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER.

Mr. HENDEE also presented joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Vermont, relative to the remonetization of silver; which was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

DAVID WARD.

Mr. JOYCE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5235) for the relief of David Ward, of Middlesex, Washington County, Vermont; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

INCREASE OF CERTAIN PENSIONS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5236) to increase the pensions of certain pensioned soldiers and sailors who are utterly helpless from injuries received or disease contracted while in the United States service; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

REDEMPTION OF TRADE-DOLLARS.

Mr. PHELPS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5237) to provide for the redemption and recoinage of trade-dollars and their reissue in standard dollars of 412½ grains; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

CERTIFICATES OF DEPOSIT.

Mr. WOOD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5238) to authorize the issue of certificates of deposit; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM NEPHEW KING.

Mr. WOOD also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5239) for the relief of William Nephew King; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF SUNDRY CIVIL ACT.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5240) to amend a certain section of an act approved June 20, 1878, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

TREATY WITH THE NORTH GERMAN CONFEDERATION.

Mr. COX, of New York, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 202) as to giving notice to the North German Confederation to terminate the treaty of February 22, 1868; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask that the joint resolution may be read at length.

The joint resolution was read in extenso, and was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ANN M. PAULDING.

Mr. CHITTENDEN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5241) granting a pension to Ann M. Paulding, widow of Rear-Admiral Hiram Paulding; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PHEBE BARNES.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New York, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5242) for the relief of Phebe Barnes, widow of Dexter Barnes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CHAPTER 10 OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. HARDENBERGH introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5243) to repeal chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes, entitled "Legacies and Successions," and to repeal all reservations of said taxes in former repealing statutes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

DRY-DOCK AT LEAGUE ISLAND.

Mr. FREEMAN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5244) appropriating $400,000 for the erection of a dry-dock at League Island naval station; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

DUTY ON MATCHES.

Mr. WARD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5245) abolishing all stamp duty and taxes on friction matches and lucifer matches; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES B. FURMAN.

Mr. OVERTON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5246) for the relief of James B. Furman of Austinville, Bradford County, Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

FRANCIS O'CLEARY.

Mr. OVERTON also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5247) granting a pension to Francis O'Cleary, late a private in the Eighty-ninth Regiment New York Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES N. WARNER.

Mr. OVERTON also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5248) for the relief of Charles N. Warner, late first lieutenant of the Fourth Artillery of the Army of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LEWIS W. DETRICH.

Mr. STENGER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5249) to increase the pension of Lewis W. Detrich; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

BOUNTY LAND.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 203) repealing so much of joint resolution No. 46, approved March 2, 1867, as requires proof of loyalty before soldiers of the war of 1812 or their widows can obtain bounty land under the act of March 3, 1855; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. RAINEY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5250) to further regulate the manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress and to punish fraud at such elections; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. BELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5251) to repeal an act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNAL-REVENUE OFFICERS.

Mr. BELL also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5252) to abolish certain internal-revenue officers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNAL-REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. BELL also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5253) to amend the internal-revenue laws; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

TAX ON TOBACCO.

Mr. BELL also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5254) to authorize the producers of tobacco to dispose of the same without the payment of any tax thereon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. SINGLETON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5255) to reduce the expenses of the public printing and binding, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

DELLA BENNER.

Mr. CHALMERS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5256) granting a pension to Mrs. Della Benner, widow of the late Lieutenant Hiram H. Benner; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. CHALMERS also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5257) to prevent corruption in elections; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

YELLOW-FEVER EPIDEMIC.

Mr. HOOKER submitted a concurrent resolution relating to the recent yellow-fever epidemic; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Rules.

MISSISSIPPI LEVEES.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5258) for the improvement of the Mississippi River from the head of the passes near its mouth to its headwaters; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Mississippi Levees and the Improvement of the Mississippi River, and ordered to be printed.

YELLOW FEVER.

Mr. GIBSON also submitted a concurrent resolution for the appointment of a commission to inquire into the history of yellow fever and the means of its prevention and arrest; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Rules.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. GIBSON also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5259) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, approved March 3, A. D. 1875;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

YELLOW FEVER.

Mr. ACKLEN submitted a concurrent resolution for the appointment of a committee to investigate the causes of the late yellow-fever epidemic, and report if legislation by Congress is necessary to prevent a recurrence thereof; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Rules.

JOHN K. DIXON.

Mr. BANNING introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5260) honorably mustering out of the service John K. Dixon, late private Company K, Eleventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

I. D. CLARK.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5261) granting a pension to I. D. Clark, late major Fifty-second Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES DOUGHERTY.

Mr. McMAHON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5262) granting a pension to Charles Dougherty, late private in Company B, Seventh Regiment West Virginia Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

FREEMAN JOHNSON.

Mr. McMAHON also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5263) granting a pension to Freeman Johnson, late private in Company F, One hundred and forty-fourth Regiment Ohio Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

EDWARD WELSH.

Mr. McMAHON also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5264) granting a pension to Edward Welsh, late a private in Company F, Twenty-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McMAHON also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5265) granting a pension to Patrick Hardiman, late private in Company D, Sixth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

DANIEL MEENAN.

Mr. McMAHON also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5266) granting a pension to Daniel Meenan, late a private in Company G, Ninety-third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM BUCKLEY.

Mr. McMAHON also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5267) granting a pension to William Buckley, late a private in Company C, Fiftieth Regiment Ohio Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

TRADE-DOLLAR.

Mr. DURHAM introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5268) making the trade-dollar a legal tender; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. H. M'PHERSON.

Mr. DURHAM also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5269) granting a pension to William H. H. McPherson, Company G, Twenty-Second Indiana Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

EPIDEMICS.

Mr. YOUNG presented a concurrent resolution for the appointment of a select committee by the Senate and House of Representatives on the subject of epidemics; which was referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. YOUNG. I ask that the resolution be read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done at this time and under this call. At the conclusion of the morning hour it will be in order to submit that request to the House.

SILVER COINS.

Mr. DIBRELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5270) making the trade-dollar and other silver coins a legal tender; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

RICHARD STEVENSON.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Indiana, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5271) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Richard Stevenson, late assistant quartermaster of volunteers, and his bondsmen; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM KNIGHT.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Indiana, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5272) granting a pension to William Knight, late a private in the Nineteenth Indiana Battery; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

TRADE-DOLLAR.

Mr. HUNTER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5273) to require the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to cause the trade-dollar to be received and exchanged for the legal silver dollar of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES H. WOODARD.

Mr. EVANS, of Indiana, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5274) granting a pension to James H. Woodard; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

He also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5275) for the relief of James H. Woodard; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN N. BRADY.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5276) granting a pension to John N. Brady, late a private in Company G, Forty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

TRADE-DOLLARS.

Mr. FORT introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5277) to provide for the exchange of trade-dollars for legal-tender silver dollars, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. FORT. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Does not this bill belong to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures? I ask that it be read.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Three or four bills upon this subject have already been introduced this morning and referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and I think this bill should take the same course.

Mr. FORT. I conceive that this bill relates to the currency quality of the silver dollar and in no degree to the question of coinage, which is entirely mechanical. I think the bill should go to the Committee on Banking and Currency, as it relates to the currency of the country.

The SPEAKER. That is a question for the House to determine. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] moves that the bill introduced by him be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] moves to amend so as to refer the bill to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. The question will be first upon the amendment.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia; and upon a division—ayes 106, noes 40—it was agreed to.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES D. R. BROWN.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5278) granting an increase of pension to James D. R. Brown, late private Company H, Sixty-sixth Regiment of Indiana Infantry Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

DANIEL Z. WARD.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5279) granting a pension to Daniel Z. Ward, late a private in Company I, One hundred and seventeenth Regiment of Infantry, Indiana Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WYATT BOTTS.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5280) granting a pension to Wyatt Botts, late a private in Company B, Eighty-eighth Regiment of Infantry, Ohio Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE A. WILSON.

Mr. BOYD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5281) for the relief of George A. Wilson, of Peoria, Illinois; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. BUCKNER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5282) for the improvement of the navigation of the Cuivre River, in the State of Missouri; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCKNER also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5283) to improve the landing and harbor at Saint Charles, Missouri, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH H. M'GEE.

Mr. POLLARD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5284) granting a pension to Joseph H. McGee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. SLEMONS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5285) to repeal section 3412, chapter 8, second edition, Revised Statutes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

JUDICIAL RECORDS OF WESTERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS.

Mr. REAGAN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5286) to restore the records and files in the district and circuit courts of the United States for the western district of Texas, lately destroyed by fire; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

TRADE-DOLLAR.

Mr. PRICE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5287) making the trade-dollar a legal tender; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

COLONEL G. W. LAPOINTE.

Mr. HUMPHREY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5288) granting a pension to Colonel G. W. Lapointe; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. PAGE (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5289) to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. PAGE. I ask that this bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. By the title of the bill, the more appropriate reference would appear to be the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. PAGE. I think the bill ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. Does it relate to private land claims? If it does, it ought to go to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. PAGE. Very well; let it go there. If that is not the right reference it can be changed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will give the gentleman every opportunity to correct the reference if it should be erroneous.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MARCELLUS WILSON.

Mr. LUTTRELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5290) to amend an act entitled "An act to restore the name of Marcellus Wilson, of the Regiment of Mounted Riflemen in the Mexican war, to the pension roll;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

RILEY, HARDIN & TAYLOR.

Mr. LUTTRELL also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5291) for the relief of Riley, Hardin & Taylor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

JURISDICTION OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. LUTTRELL also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5292) to confer upon the United States Court of Claims jurisdiction in certain cases; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SACRAMENTO RIVER.

Mr. LUTTRELL also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5293) to appropriate money to improve the navigation of the Sacramento River; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

FEATHER RIVER.

Mr. LUTTRELL also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5294) to appropriate money to improve the navigation of Feather River; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

KLAMATH INDIAN RESERVATION, OREGON.

Mr. LUTTRELL (by request) also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5295) to adjust the claims of the owners of lands within the limits of the Klamath Indian reservation in the State of Oregon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

SETTLERS ON LANDS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. STEWART introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5296) for the relief of settlers on lands in Minnesota; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

COIN AND BULLION RESERVES, TREASURY UNITED STATES.

Mr. PHILLIPS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5297) to maintain and limit the coin and bullion reserves in the Treasury of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

SIOUX CITY AND PEMBINA RAILROAD.

Mr. KIDDER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5298) granting the right of way and depot grounds to the Sioux City and Pembina Railroad Company through the public lands of the United States from Beloit, in the State of Iowa, to the Missouri River, in the Territory of Dakota, at or near the mouth of White River; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

EXPULSION OF JULIUS BAUMER.

Mr. BRENTANO, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, all the papers and correspondence between this Government and the government of the German Empire in reference to the expulsion from the whole territory of the German Empire of Julius Baumer, a naturalized citizen of the United States, and a resident of the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, while on a visit to his aged parents at Münsten, Westphalia, in the Kingdom of Prussia, by the Prussian government, in violation of the treaty of May 1, 1828.

PURCHASE OF FOREIGN-BUILT SHIPS.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5299) to amend the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to allow the purchase and register of foreign-built ships by citizens of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELLEY. The proper reference would be to the Committee of Ways and Means, and I make that motion.

Mr. HARRISON. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill to amend title 48 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to authorize the purchase of foreign-built ships by citizens of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That so many of the various provisions of title 48 of the Revised Statutes, entitled "Regulations of Commerce and Navigation," embraced in chapters 1 to 9 in said title, and from section

4131 to section 4305, both inclusive, as prohibit or restrict citizens of the United States from purchasing ships built in other countries, to be used in the carrying trade of the United States, or which impose taxes, burdens, or restrictions on such ships, where owned by American citizens, which are not imposed on ships built in the United States, be, and hereby are, repealed; and it shall be lawful hereafter for all citizens of the United States to buy ships built in whole or in part in any foreign country and have them registered as ships of the United States; and when so purchased and registered, such ships shall be entitled to all the rights and subject only to the same regulations as are now provided by law for the government and management of ships built wholly within the United States and owned and controlled by citizens thereof.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, that subject-matter has been before the Committee on Commerce, and in my judgment it is not appropriate to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say that it is a proposition seriously affecting the revenues, as well as the whole tariff system. It proposes to admit, when manufactured into a ship, an infinite number of dutiable articles; and as questions of revenue belong to the Committee of Ways and Means, it seems to me the bill should go to that committee. It would work a complete revolution in many departments of our customs revenue, and no subject could be more appropriate for the consideration of the committee charged with that subject than the one here involved.

Mr. WOOD. I concur entirely with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and for the additional reason that the subject has been already referred by the House to the Committee of Ways and Means. That committee had it under consideration during the last session, and came to a conclusion upon it. As it does involve, as my friend has said, questions of revenue and tariff, it certainly should go to the committee having exclusive jurisdiction of those subjects.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs to remind the House debate on this must be very brief.

Mr. HARRISON. One word. My impression is, both the gentlemen of the Committee of Ways and Means are widely mistaken in their construction of this proposition. There is now no duty on ships. This is simply a question whether a ship built in foreign ship-yards may be introduced into the United States or not.

Mr. KELLEY. It is made up of dutiable articles.

Mr. HARRISON. If you please, it is not whether duty shall be taken off, but shall foreign-built ships be allowed to be brought here and registered? May they be brought into this country? I moved to refer it to the Committee on Commerce as the committee eminently fitted and properly constructed to examine into that question. It relates to commerce, which is of more importance to the country than anything else. It is wholly a question of commerce, and not of revenue.

Mr. REAGAN. The question of revenue does not enter into this matter, but, as indicated in the bill, it is a question of policy. The policy of the bill is the main subject, and that is whether foreign-built ships, which are now prohibited from being purchased and put under commission in the United States, may be hereafter brought in. That does not affect the revenues directly, because foreign-built ships are now prohibited and no duty or revenue is collected from them. It is not a question primarily of revenue at all. That is but the incident to the question which is presented to the House, which is one relating to the commercial interests of the country.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, who introduces the bill, moves to refer it to the Committee on Commerce. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] moves to amend that motion so that the bill shall be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. The question is first on the amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 85.

Mr. KELLY and Mr. LUTTRELL called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HARRISON and Mr. KELLEY were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 91.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was accordingly referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

TERMS OF COURT IN KANSAS.

Mr. HASKELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5300) to provide for the holding of terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States at Fort Scott, Kansas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH POTTS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5301) to place the name of Joseph Potts, of Johnson County, Missouri, on the pension-list; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

TRADE-DOLLARS.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5302) making the trade-dollars convertible into the legal-tender silver dollars at par, at the option of the holders, and to regulate and restrict the coinage of trade-dollars; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

HELEN M. SCHOLEFIELD.

Mr. BACON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5303) for the relief of Helen M. Scholefield, administratrix of the estate of Major C. M. Scholefield, deceased, late an additional paymaster of the Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

TRADE-DOLLARS.

Mr. CUTLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5304) to provide for retiring the trade-dollar and for its recoinage into the standard silver dollar; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

NATURALIZATION TREATY WITH PRUSSIA.

Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 204) providing for the termination of the naturalization treaty between the United States and Prussia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DURHAM. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the Military Academy appropriation bill, and pending that motion I move that all general debate on the bill be limited to five minutes.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House the committee takes up for consideration at this time the bill (H. R. No. 5230) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes. The House has ordered that general debate be limited to five minutes.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to inquire of the gentleman reporting the bill if it has been printed.

Mr. DURHAM. Yes, sir; the bill is in print. The printer's number is 5889. I ask that by unanimous consent the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment, and read the following paragraph:

For repairs and improvements, timber, plank, boards, joists, wall-strips, laths, shingles, slate, tin, sheet-lead, zinc, nails, screws, locks, hinges, glass, paint, turpentine, oils, bricks, varnish, stone, lime, cement, plaster, hair, sewer and drain pipe, blasting-powder, fuse, iron, steel, tools, mantels, and other similar materials, and for pay of citizen mechanics and labor employed upon repairs that cannot be done by enlisted men, $11,000.

Mr. BEEBE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after line 50 as follows:
For furnishing an increased and permanent supply of water, $50,000.

Mr. BEEBE. Mr. Chairman, after a somewhat careful personal examination into this matter, I have become thoroughly convinced that it is absolute inhumanity on the part of the Government of the United States to maintain that post at West Point in the condition it is in at present. The Department, the officers in command, and all interested there, have year after year asked Congress to make an appropriation that will provide an increased supply of water. They need it for personal use; they need it in order to render available the drainage facilities of the Academy. That post is now in such a condition that the sanitary interests of those who are compelled to remain there absolutely demand this appropriation. The Board of Visitors have repeatedly recommended it, and all the officers stationed at the post.

All that is asked to secure a wholesome supply of water for the use of the academy is a small appropriation of $50,000. The stream which has supplied fresh water to that post for years has been decreasing in its volume because of the removal of timber and for other reasons, and now this additional source of supply is absolutely required, and I trust the committee will recommend the adoption of the amendment I have suggested. In respect to the matter of supply the Board of Visitors adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That this board, after careful examination, is satisfied that the present water supply of the post is wholly inadequate to the sanitary requirements of the cadets, officers, and men here stationed, or to furnish proper facilities for the protection of the public buildings and property in case of fire.

Those extensive and expensive buildings are almost wholly at the mercy of the flames at certain seasons of the year. When the water supply is diminished, should fire break out in those buildings it would be absolutely impossible to save them. Every consideration of economy, as well as of humanity, demands that this appropriation be made, and I earnestly hope that this committee will second me in my effort to secure it.

Mr. DURHAM. This is not the first time that a proposition has been made here for the purpose of purchasing what is called "Round Pond." But the recommendation of my friend from New York makes a difference of $10,000. The Book of Estimates only asks for $40,000, but my friend goes $10,000 further; he wants $50,000.

Now, at the last session the commandant of the post recommended the purchase of what is called "Round Pond," a small lake about four miles from this little town. Now, it is true the Board of Visitors recommended the purchase of this pond, but they do not place it upon as high ground as the gentleman from New York. My friend argues very strongly that this matter is absolutely necessary.

There is nothing in the Book of Estimates or in the recommendation of the Board of Visitors that this thing is absolutely necessary, and the committee have not come to the conclusion that it is absolutely necessary. It may be very proper, it may be very expedient under certain circumstances to have that pond. I will venture the assertion that they do not need "absolutely" this supply of water.

It is like what is called the "hospital." The hospital foundation was laid there for a splendid superstructure, and after years shows that it is scarcely needed at all. What I mean by that is that it is a sort of luxury that can be used, and hence it is that the committee of visitors recommend the $40,000 and not $50,000. Still it is not necessary that it should be purchased; they can do very well without it; a conclusion the committee came to after mature deliberation.

Why, Mr. Chairman, if I have but a moment further——

Mr. BEEBE. If the gentleman will allow me I must be permitted to say that they have not done "very well without it."

Mr. DURHAM. Why! there is not a healthier place scarcely anywhere than West Point. In regard to the hospital, I understand the record shows that there have not been a half dozen students sick at any one time.

Mr. FOSTER. Inasmuch as the Board of Visitors has been referred to, I will send up to the Clerk's desk to be read their report on this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

In respect to the matter of water supply, the board adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That this board, after careful examination, is satisfied that the present water supply of the post is wholly inadequate to the sanitary requirements of the cadets, officers, and men here stationed, or to furnish proper facilities for the protection of the public buildings and property in case of fire.

From a letter addressed to the board, at their request, by Captain C. H. Ernst, of the Corps of Engineers, (and which will be found in full in the appendix to this report, marked B,) and from other sources of information, it appears that during the dry seasons the ordinary supply of water for the post not unfrequently fails entirely, while the quality is at all times indifferent.

During the summer of 1876, for several weeks the use of bath-rooms and water-closets was prohibited, the water backs of all ranges were removed at considerable cost for plumbing, and at the front gate of each house was to be seen a barrel, which was filled daily from a cart. During this time there were no means of checking a fire had one broken out, the health of the inhabitants was in danger from the poisonous gases from sewers and waste-pipes, and much labor needed for other things was absorbed in providing the daily supply such as it was.

In 1877 the regular supply of water was again exhausted and water had to be repumped into the main from a spring near the level of the Hudson River, which is about one hundred and fifty feet below the level of the principal buildings.

This expedient presented the necessity of removing the water backs and of hauling, but it furnished no protection against fire and would not have answered the other purposes for any considerable length of time.

A good and adequate supply of water for all the academical buildings and grounds can, however, be readily obtained from a small mountain lake or pond situated about four miles from the post and at an elevation above the post of about seven hundred and fifteen feet. And this lake and the necessary lands adjoining can now be purchased by the Government, and all the expenditures for conducting a supply of four hundred thousand gallons daily to the post be defrayed at a cost which will not be in excess of $40,000.

Mr. FOSTER. The report of the Board of Visitors establishes three things: first, that at all times the quality of the water is indifferent; secondly, that in dry seasons they have no supply at all, and the cadets are prohibited from using the closets; lastly, that there is no protection against fire.

Now, these are the three things that this House should consider: first, that at all times the quality of the water is indifferent, and during the last three seasons they have been compelled to haul water for their supply, and there is no protection against fire.

Mr. BEEBE. The gentleman from Kentucky——

Mr. FOSTER. Just a word, Mr. Chairman. I suggest to my friend from New York that he reduce the amount.

Mr. BEEBE. That is what I propose to do. Feeling as I do the necessity for prompt action in this matter, I introduced the resolution for the sum of $50,000.

As to the play that my friend from Kentucky, the distinguished logician, makes upon the term absolutely, I suppose this bill is not absolutely necessary, and I suppose the Government of the United States could continue its existence without it. I suppose the country could be continued without any West Point whatever. We might resolve ourselves into a community of Quakers, and when smitten upon one cheek turn the other also. The information that I have obtained is by personal inspection upon the ground. I went to West Point prejudiced against this proposition. I make no proposition for the purchase of Round Lake or any other pond. I merely submit that there shall be some interest taken by the Government of the United States in the matter of the protection of the property from fire.

I ask that the appropriation be reduced, as I have suggested, from $50,000 to $40,000.

Mr. BANNING. I wish merely to say in addition to the statement which has been read here from the report of the Board of Visitors for this year, that the Board of Visitors to West Point for the year previous, after having carefully examined this question, unanimously came to the conclusion that the water supply for the post should be increased, and reported unanimously in favor of an appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. DURHAM. I would ask my distinguished friend whether they recommended the purchase of Round Pond, as it is called here?

Mr. BANNING. I do not recollect whether we recommended the purchase of Round Pond or not. But after a careful examination of the question we found that the water supply was not sufficient, and that at times the quality of the water was not good. I think the question of Round Pond was brought up, but it was not fully considered. My recollection is that I was in favor of purchasing Round Pond. General Schofield and other distinguished officers favored that purchase because it afforded the best and most lasting supply of water.

I am quite willing to trust these men, the managers of the West Point post, in this matter, and to appropriate a sum sufficient to procure good fresh water for the institution. I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. DURHAM. I am certainly as good a friend of that institution as any gentleman upon this floor, and I want these students to be healthy: I want the professors to be healthy. It is something a little remarkable that gentlemen cannot point out any case of disease that has occurred at West Point because of this impure water of which they are complaining. No such statement is made in the report anywhere. There is simply in the Book of Estimates a recommendation to purchase the pond, perhaps not in as strong terms as the Board of Visitors would make it. Now I suggest that if a supply of water be necessary there, $10,000 will be sufficient to pay for putting in plenty of good cisterns, which will be of more use than all the round ponds in the country. [Mr. BEEBE shook his head.] The gentleman may shake his head. I do not know whether this is in his district or not.

Mr. BANNING. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. DURHAM. I have yielded to the gentleman once.

Mr. BANNING. And I yielded to you.

Mr. DURHAM. Very well, I will yield.

Mr. BANNING. The cisterns would be merely temporary, while the plan proposed will be permanent. We had better make permanent improvements than resort to temporary expedients.

Mr. DURHAM. Why, sir, they had a pond, and they say it has gone dry. You can fill the cisterns every winter. This pond may go dry, too.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. DURHAM. Certainly, if I am allowed time.

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman says that sufficient and proper cisterns can be made for $10,000. Could not good pine-wood water-tanks be made cheaper?

Mr. DURHAM. How is that? I did not hear the gentleman distinctly.

Mr. FRYE. Would not some good pine-wood water-tanks, costing about $50 each, be much cheaper?

Mr. DURHAM. I do not know. I do not live in a pine country; the gentleman does. I do not know anything about pine. If the gentleman will talk about oak, then I can tell him something about that.

Mr. BEEBE. Perhaps the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] is prejudiced against water. [Laughter.]

Mr. DURHAM. Ah! "prejudiced against water." I might say that the gentleman himself might not need it when there was so much of a mixture up there.

Mr. BANNING. The pond that went dry was an artificial pond, such as the gentleman proposes to make. This is a natural lake giving a large and sufficient supply of water.

Mr. SPARKS. Will it not go dry, too?

Mr. BANNING. Not until the Lord makes all things dry.

Mr. DURHAM. This is an expensive luxury which is proposed. I insist that this institution has got along with their present supply of water without any inconvenience whatever. I insist that one-fourth of this proposed appropriation will supply a system of cisterns that will be better a great deal than this Round Pond.

Permit me to say that only two years ago the estimate was that with $13,000 we could obtain as good a supply of water for this institution as was needed. But Round Pond was not discovered then. It has been discovered within the last two years, and consequently it is proposed to increase the appropriation from $13,000 to $40,000. That is the whole state of the case.

Mr. FORT. I was one of the Board of Visitors who it is said made the report which has been referred to here. Now, in regard to that report, allow me to say that I never saw it or heard of it until it was read here to-day. I will further state that as one of the members of that board I did try to investigate this subject of a supply of water for that post. My colleague, General MANNING, of Mississippi, and myself made a visit to this famous Round Pond that has been referred to.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Call it lake.

Mr. FORT. Well, call it a lake. If it is a lake it is a very small lake; and it is not a very large pond, either. [Laughter.]

I will say for one that I would be entirely willing to vote for $50,000, or even more, to supply that post permanently with water; but I must say that when I came to see this pond or lake I was very much disappointed. I fear that if we should appropriate $50,000 to provide for carrying the waters of this pond to supply this post, in a very short number of years we should have to hunt for some other pond from which to get water. That is the only thing which would make me hesitate to vote for this appropriation. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEEBE] can assure the House that this pond will give a sufficient supply of water I shall be inclined to vote for his amendment.

Mr. BEEBE. If the gentleman will allow me just a moment, I merely desire to say that I object to the disposition evinced here to prejudice this proposition by connecting it with Round Pond or any other pond. I merely want the West Point Academy supplied with a sufficient quantity of pure, wholesome water.

Mr. FORT. That is just what I wish.

Mr. BEEBE. There is nothing in the amendment I propose that has any reference at all to Round Pond. I do not care how the appropriation is limited, or how carefully it is guarded, but I do contend that some measure of this sort should be adopted.

Mr. FORT. The Board of Visitors was informed that a survey had been made for the purpose of laying down pipes to Round Pond, and also an estimate of the cost. In that estimate the price of the pond was put, I think, at $3,000, while the right of way to the pond made up in our judgment, or at least in my judgment, an enormous part of the appropriation.

I fear that on tapping the pond it may be found that its supply of water will be inadequate, because a very small water-shed drains into the pond—perhaps not more than twenty or thirty acres; and whether the pond has any subterranean supply is not clear, to me at least. If it should be found that this pond will furnish a sufficient supply of water, I think it our duty to tap it for the benefit of this Military Academy; but I, for one, am not satisfied that such is the case.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, the amendment of the gentleman from New York does not provide for the purchase of Round Pond. I do not understand how gentlemen reach the conclusion that this is a proposition to purchase Round Pond. I hold the amendment in my hand, and it provides for an appropriation of $40,000 for furnishing a permanent supply of water. I observe that in the Book of Estimates authority of law is asked for the purchase of Round Pond; and I doubt very much whether the Secretary of War, without specific legislation, would have power to make a purchase of that kind. I certainly understand that the amendment of the gentleman from New York does not confer such power, but simply gives the superintendent of the academy authority to increase the supply of water.

As I understand from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] and others that the Board of Visitors recommends this appropriation and deems it necessary on the ground that the present supply of water is inadequate, I am prepared to vote for it. I think we should not be picayunish in a matter of this kind. I believe we should make a sufficiently liberal appropriation. While I would object, without further consideration and further information on the subject, to the purchase of Round Pond, I am, nevertheless, willing to vote for this appropriation for an additional supply of water.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the arguments presented in this discussion in relation to the quantity of water required at West Point remind me of a similar discussion which sprang up here in reference to a hospital at the same place. If you will take the reports of the Surgeon-General's Office for many, many years, you will find them to contain highly complimentary language as to the facilities provided at West Point for hospital purposes. Yet suddenly, during the first session of the last Congress, we were informed that the hospital facilities there were inadequate, and a very great outcry was raised on that point; but when we came to inquire into the matter more particularly we found connected with the idea of increased hospital facilities a very earnest desire on the part of certain officers at West Point for increased accommodations for their families. The idea was to get a new hospital and use the present one as quarters for officers' families. The two ideas grew up together, side by side. The idea of procuring additional accommodations for the families of officers was the underlying consideration of the proposition to provide increased facilities for meeting the wants of the sick. Until the former object was conceived there had been no suggestion in reference to the latter.

So, likewise, in regard to this proposed appropriation for increasing the water facilities. The gentleman from Ohio has read from the report of the Board of Visitors for 1876 and 1877. It was then that this agitation of an increased water supply commenced. Prior to that time there had been no trouble. Gentlemen do not cite the reports of previous Boards of Visitors. Suddenly an idea was conceived that the water supply was short; and that idea has been hammered at ever since. It is impressed upon the Board of Visitors whenever they go there. It has been urged in this way for the last two years.

Sir, no proposition comes to this House that is not covered all over with reasons, reasons which as a general rule disappear on investigation. In nothing do we see more fertility than in finding expedients and reasons for getting appropriations through this House. I trust that at least in this short session we shall not countenance any proposition of this kind.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this appropriation, both on principle and from experience. I look upon it as the forerunner of another appropriation which this House will be called upon to make in a very short time. If we now appropriate this sum of $40,000, it will not be long before we shall be informed that the amount has been expended, and we shall be urged to make another appropriation. I have not learned from the discussion thus far whether there has been any survey by an experienced engineer of the ground from the pond to the point where it is proposed to introduce the water. We have no estimate of the cost, no data upon which we can safely rely in making the appropriation now asked for.

Sir, I am reminded of an occasion during the Thirty-third Congress when this House was called upon to appropriate money for the purpose of introducing water from the Upper Potomac into the city of Washington for the purpose, as was alleged, of protecting the public buildings. I opposed that measure. I said then that if the introduction of water for the purpose of protecting the public buildings was the only object, we could obtain water from the Potomac near by, and force it up into a reservoir here upon Capitol Hill, (just as has been done at Fairmount, in Philadelphia,) to be distributed thence to every public building in the city for its protection. But there was an undercurrent in connection with that proposition. That was not the only reason given for introducing water in that manner. Almost every inhabitant of the city of Washington would button-hole members of Congress and say it was necessary to have water. But, sir, it was for their own domestic purposes more than for the protection of the public buildings. I said then, "appropriate money for the introduction of water from the Upper Potomac as it has been introduced and it will cost this Government millions and millions of money." My prediction has proven to be true, for that aqueduct has cost this Government many millions of money to introduce the water as it is introduced now.

I therefore say this appropriation will be only the forerunner of another appropriation, and it will not be long before we will be called upon to grant more money for the purpose of introducing water from perhaps another round pond.

Besides, we have yet to learn whether there is any outflow of water from this pond, and if so, what the quantity of that outflow is. Now we should know that before we make this large appropriation of money for any such purpose.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move, Mr. Chairman, the following amendment to the amendment of my colleague.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That not more than $5,000 shall be expended for the purchase of the necessary land and water rights and the right of way: And provided further, That no portion of the sum hereby appropriated shall be expended until the Secretary of War shall decide that the sum hereby appropriated is sufficient to secure an adequate supply of pure water.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Chairman, from the statements which have been submitted to the committee it is quite evident this House is not in possession of such information as will enable it to legislate intelligently on this important matter. It is not clear that even $40,000 will secure the property necessary to give an adequate supply of water. There is an estimate in the report of the Board of Visitors by which $5,000 is allowed for that purpose, but I also observe that the quantity of water as there estimated for is limited to the period which covers the dry season, and that is supposed to be sufficient for some time to come—several years to come.

I think it is admitted by everybody this post ought to be supplied with good water, but I think we should proceed with some caution in the matter. The Secretary of War undoubtedly, if the amendment is put in the form which I suggest, will be very careful to permit no expenditure unless he is satisfied there will be a permanent adequate supply of pure water. I trust with that amendment the motion of my friend from New York will be adopted.

Mr. BEEBE. I understand my colleague from New York to state that amount of $5,000 is what the estimate specifies for the purpose. With that view and with that understanding, I think the committee is ready to accept that amendment.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am not willing to vote for this amendment after the remark made by my friend from Illinois, [Mr. FORT,] who said that he was one of the visitors last year to West Point, and that so far as this report is concerned he never saw it and did not join in it. He told us, furthermore, that he had visited this Round Lake or Round Pond, and from the examination that he was able to make he is satisfied it is not sufficient for the purpose in contemplation.

Now, I find in an appendix to this report of the Board of Visitors to West Point an itemized statement of the amount necessary to purchase this lake and to make the necessary connection for supplying water to this post. If the information of the gentleman from Illinois is correct, then this appropriation is practically little more than a waste of the public money, for it will not accomplish the purpose desired. The estimate of the amount necessary to purchase this lake or pond and eleven acres of ground in the aggregate is $5,000. Pass the amendment of the gentleman from New York and it will commit this House and the Government to the purchase of property which the gentleman from Illinois has told us will not accomplish the purpose.

Mr. BEEBE. It does not commit the Government at all.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Let me say that in the amendment I offer it is limited and dependent upon the decision of the Secretary of War that this money will accomplish the purpose.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will allow me, I fancy the head of the Department will be regulated by the report of the engineers, whose statement, made here, is in favor of this purchase of Round Lake, which the Board of Visitors, according to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, do not approve of.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Some one must decide all these questions.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I am aware of that, but it is for the House to decide now whether it will make this appropriation of money or not.

Mr. DURHAM. I wish to say one single word, and that is simply this: In reference to the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois, the House will bear in mind these reports are all gotten up without the sanction of the whole Board of Visitors. Some, perhaps, may never see the report. The gentleman from Illinois said he never saw it, and I venture the statement that my friend from Mississippi never saw it until it came to the House. As has been remarked by my friend from Georgia, this is the way in which these matters are gotten up at these institutions.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Mississippi said that he never did see it.

Mr. DURHAM. He told me so a moment ago.

Mr. FORT. I do not wish to impeach this report in any way. I only wish to say that I never saw it myself until to-day.

Mr. DURHAM. I wish to say to the gentlemen of this committee, if they come to serve on the Committee on Appropriations they will find that they will have to be very careful about all these estimates. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BEEBE] says he has made an investigation about this matter. So have I. I have not been upon the ground so as to make a personal examination. I have, however, made use of all the means in my power, and I say this committee ought to be cautious about committing themselves to this forty-thousand-dollar proposition. I ask for a vote.

Mr. FORT. I desire to say a word. This report speaks of the purchase of eleven acres. It ought to be understood that these eleven acres are not all covered with water; they include all the ground that drains into this pond. The pond itself is a very small affair; eleven acres are what drains into it; and if the Government purchases eleven acres, it will purchase all the land that drains into this lake. For my part, I am in favor, as I said before, of supplying that post with water, but I was not quite sure that this small pond would be adequate for the purpose.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I would like to ask my friend from Illinois whether he does not think the amendment I have offered guards that sufficiently: that no portion of the money shall be expended until the Secretary of War shall be satisfied and decides it is sufficient.

Mr. FORT. I think that ought to guard it.

Mr. MANNING. I desire to correct an impression which perhaps exists in the mind of my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM.] I never saw the report submitted by Mr. Wells, the president of the Board of Visitors, until yesterday. But I do not mean here and now to condemn this report. After a somewhat hasty reading of it, so far as I am aware, I concur in the suggestions which the report contains. I took the trip which was referred to by my friend from Illinois [Mr. FORT] to see this mountain pond. Indeed, I introduced the resolution before the Board of Visitors that we should examine that pond and take the engineer with us so as to see what the probable cost would be. Of course our examination was a hasty one, and we relied largely upon the engineer who accompanied us upon that trip.

I felt quite sure when at West Point, and I have learned nothing since to change that opinion, that the supply of water was inadequate. And I desire to say to my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] that I do not agree with him that in 1876, for the first time, a cry was raised that there was not a sufficient supply of water at West Point. I heard there, and I see that Mr. Wells has made the statement here, that

From other sources of information—

Speaking of the question whether they had sufficient water or not—and I may say that I heard it from many persons; General Schofield was perhaps my first informant, the engineer, Captain Ernst, was another, I think, with whom I conversed—

From other sources of information, it appears that during the dry season—the ordinary supply of water for the post not unfrequently fails entirely, while the quality is at all times indifferent.

Not in 1876 merely, but for years—

I heard from several gentlemen that barrels of water were placed at the gates of the persons who resided there—the persons belonging to the Academy, students and professors. I heard that the baths had to be abandoned; I heard that the closets had to be abandoned, and that two millions of property were exposed there, during the dry seasons, to fire.

I am not prepared to say at this moment, for I do not know, whether $40,000 is too much. I had to rely then, and I do so now, very largely upon the estimate made by Captain Ernst. I did not catch the precise effect of the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] to the amendment of his colleague, [Mr. BEEBE.] Before the vote is taken I would ask that that amendment be again read.

The amendment to the amendment was again read.

Mr. BEEBE. Is it competent for me to accept the amendment of my colleague?

The CHAIRMAN. It is competent for the gentleman to accept it unless there be objection. [After a pause.] There being no objection, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEEBE] is permitted to accept the amendment offered by his colleague.

Mr. DURHAM. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The question being taken on the adoption of the amendment as modified by the addition of the proviso offered by Mr. HEWITT, of New York, there were—ayes 86, noes 49.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DURHAM. I shall demand a vote in the House on that proposition.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following paragraph:

For continuing and furnishing for use the main building and one wing for the new hospital for cadets, $12,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend by striking out "$12,000" and inserting "$30,000."

Mr. Chairman, it is the policy of the gentlemen having charge of the appropriations to build this hospital wing for cadets at West Point. I differ from them in this regard. It will take about $36,000 to complete the wing. They propose to appropriate $12,000 a year to do it. I think that unwise, and that it would be better, cheaper, and more economical to appropriate the entire sum at once. I think there is no disagreement in the committee as to the ultimate completion of the wing; but instead of making the appropriation by installments, as the sum is small, it strikes me that the wise course is to appropriate enough at once for the completion of the wing.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I suggest to my friend from Ohio to make the amendment so as to cover two years.

Mr. FOSTER. Make it, then, $24,000.

Mr. DURHAM. There was a fight over this matter at the last session, and this was rather a subject of compromise than otherwise on the part of the committee of conference at that time. It was a matter of compromise in the committee of conference that the appropriation should run in accordance with that agreement as stated by Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, and myself. We put $12,000 this year, and I trust the House will stand by it. This is the cause of it. I admit very frankly that the work will be completed some time, but I hope the amendment will be voted down for the reason I have stated.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. FOSTER; and on a division there were—ayes 57, noes 61.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DURHAM. I now move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 5230) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had instructed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with a recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill be passed.

Mr. DURHAM. I move the previous question upon the bill and the amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was read, as follows:

Amend by adding, after line 50, as follows:

For furnishing an increased and permanent supply of water, $40,000: Provided, That not more than $5,000 shall be expended for the purchase of the necessary land and water rights and the right of way: And provided further, That no portion of the sum hereby appropriated shall be expended until the Secretary of War shall decide the sum hereby appropriated is sufficient to secure an adequate supply of pure water.

The first question was upon agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DURHAM. On that amendment I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 140, nays 73, not voting 78; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. STEWART. I am paired with Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. If he were present, I would vote "ay."

Mr. DEERING. Mr. BANKS, of Massachusetts, is paired upon all political questions with Mr. BLAND, of Missouri.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. My colleague, Mr. CRAPO, is confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. STRAIT. My colleague, Mr. DUNNELL, is absent on account of sickness. If he were present, he would vote "ay."

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. My colleague, Mr. BLAND, is detained from the House by indisposition.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DURHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WOOD. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] to withdraw that motion for a few minutes.

Mr. WOOD. For what purpose?

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to state that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] desires to ask the House to proceed now to the consideration of the fortification appropriation bill.

Mr. WOOD. How long will it take?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. The bill which I desire to have considered at this time is identically the same bill that was passed last year without objection by both Houses. I do not think its consideration will take more than five minutes.

Mr. WOOD. I will withdraw the motion to adjourn.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I move that the rules be suspended and the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the fortification appropriation bill. And pending that motion I move that all general debate on the bill be limited to one minute.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The motion of Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. POTTER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. No. 5231) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent that the first and formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be now read by paragraphs for amendment.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk then read the bill.

No amendment was offered.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill to the House without amendment, and with a recommendation that the same do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POTTER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 5231) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment, and with the recommendation that the same do pass.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOOD. I now renew the motion that the House adjourn.

YELLOW-FEVER EPIDEMIC.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] asked this morning during the morning hour that a concurrent resolution offered by him to provide for a joint committee to investigate the subject of the yellow-fever epidemic be printed in the RECORD. It was not in order for the Chair to submit that request to the House at that time. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] made a similar request. The Chair would suggest that all the propositions upon the subject of the yellow-fever epidemic—there were but four or five of them—be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The concurrent resolutions are as follows:

By Mr. ACKLEN:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That a committee of four members of the Senate and five members of the House of Representatives be appointed respectively by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives to investigate the origin and causes of the late yellow-fever epidemic, to employ such experts, clerks, and stenographers as are needed, to send for persons and papers, to send said experts or visit by subcommittee the lately infected and other places, and to report at any time by bill or otherwise what legislation, if any, shall be enacted by Congress to prevent a recurrence of like epidemics.

By Mr. GIBSON:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That a commission is hereby authorized and constituted, to consist of five (5) Senators, to be appointed by the Senate; five (5) members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker; and experts not exceeding seven (7) in number, to be selected by and associated with them, with authority to determine the time and place of meeting, to employ a stenographer and clerk, to take testimony, and whose duty it shall be to inquire into the recent history and the means of prevention and arrest of yellow fever, and to report the facts and their opinions and recommendations at any time.

By Mr. HOOKER:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That a joint committee of seven on the part of the House and ——— on the part of the Senate be appointed by the presiding officers of the Senate and House, to be styled the Sanitary Committee, whose duty it shall be—

First. To inquire into the nature and cause of the recent yellow-fever epidemic.

Second. To inquire as to the safest and best mode of preventing its return by establishment of a national quarantine or otherwise.

Third. To confer with the legislative committee appointed by the national health convention at its recent session in the city of Richmond, Virginia.

Fourth. Said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths to witnesses, and are empowered to report by bill or otherwise.

By Mr. YOUNG:

Whereas the epidemic which has recently prevailed in large districts of several of the States of the Union has been so destructive to human life and the interests and prosperity of the whole country as to make it a subject of gravest public concern, and its prevention in future an important duty, to the end that its return may be prevented so far as prompt and decided action can prevent,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That a joint select committee of four Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and five Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House, be appointed to investigate and report the best means of preventing the introduction and spread of epidemic diseases, especially yellow fever and cholera, within the limits of the United States. That said committee be allowed a clerk, and, if in the course of its investigations it is found necessary, a stenographer. And that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to employ experts and scientists, not to exceed seven in number, and send them to, and by subcommittee visit, recently infected localities and other places for the purpose of obtaining the fullest and most accurate information; and that said committee may report at any time during the present session of Congress, by bill or otherwise.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (coming over from the last session) of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1625) granting a pension to Abram V. Miller, late a lieutenant in Company E of the One hundred and eighty-fourth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted by unanimous consent as follows:

To Mr. MACKEY, for four days; and

To Mr. BURDICK, for ten days, on account of important business.

ISABEL L. EVANS.

Mr. BELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5305) granting an increase of pension to Isabel L. Evans; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, andordered to be printed.

JOSEPH W. SEELEY.

Mr. BREWER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5306) to increase the pension of Joseph W. Seeley, late a private in Company H, Seventh Michigan Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

COMPENSATION OF POSTMASTERS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting a communication from the Sixth Auditor in relation to the compensation of certain postmasters; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REPORT OF THE COMPTROLLER OF CURRENCY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Comptroller of the Currency, transmitting his annual report; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

CONDITION OF THE FINANCES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting his annual report on the condition of the finances for the year 1878; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

DOORKEEPER OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, transmitting an inventory of the public property in his possession at the commencement of the third session of the Forty-fifth Congress; which was referred to the Committee of Accounts, and ordered to be printed.

JUDGMENTS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting, in pursuance of section 1057 of the Revised Statutes, a statement of the judgments rendered by said court for the year ending December 2, 1878; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SURVEYS OF THE TERRITORIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting president of the National Academy of Sciences, transmitting a report from the National Academy of Sciences on the subject of the surveys of the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. This report is accompanied by additional documents. The Committee on Appropriations ought to be authorized to have printed such of the documents as to them may seem desirable. The Chair will ask that consent be given for that purpose.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SITE OF CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, relative to the value of lands proposed to be purchased for the site of the Congressional Library; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LAWS OF MONTANA TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the secretary of the Territory of Montana, transmitting laws, memorials, and resolutions of that Territory passed at the tenth regular session of the Legislative Assembly thereof, beginning January 8, 1877, and ending February 16, 1877; which was referred to the Committee on the Territories.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I desire to give notice that to-morrow, after the morning hour, I shall move to go into the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering further the bill (H. R. No. 257) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors in the Mexican and other wars therein named.

The motion of Mr. WOOD that the House adjourn was agreed to; and accordingly (at three o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 4, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

JOHN J. PATTERSON, a Senator from the State of South Carolina, appeared in his seat to-day.

OMISSION IN ENROLLMENT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. FERRY, Mr. DAVIS of Illinois, and Mr. RANDOLPH as the committee provided for by the resolution adopted by the Senate yesterday, relative to an omission in the enrollment of the sundry civil appropriation bill at the last session of Congress.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting a communication from the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, in regard to the compensation of certain postmasters upon whose nominations the Senate failed to act during the special session of Congress which met October 15, 1877; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

BACHELDER'S SKETCH OF THE BATTLE OF GETTYSBURGH.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following communication; which was read, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

SOCIETY OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
OFFICE OF RECORDING SECRETARY,
27 Park Place, New York, December 3, 1878.

SIR: In pursuance of the instructions of the Society of the Army of the Potomac, I have the honor to forward the annexed resolution of the Society of the Army of the Potomac, passed at their last annual meeting, June 5, 1878.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

HORATIO C. KING,
Recording Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM A. WHEELER,
Vice-President of the United States.

The speeches being concluded, the following resolution was offered by General Barnum, and approved by the society:

Whereas the battle of Gettysburgh was, and always will be, considered one of the great historic events of the nation; and

Whereas Mr. John B. Bachelder, of Boston, at the commencement of the late war, foreseeing the value of a thorough detailed knowledge of the great culminating battles between the States sure to ensue, and realizing the importance of collecting such data while all the details were fresh in the minds of the participants and while the men lived who could furnish the facts or refute the errors, did abandon his business and attach himself to the Army as early as 1862, that he might be in position to do the work promptly and thoroughly wherever such an event took place, following its marches, sketching and noting the details of battles; and

Whereas at Gettysburgh he reached the field immediately after the battle was fought, while the wounded from every regiment of both armies remained to tell the story, and while the havoc of battle marked the limits of the field; that he sketched its vast proportions, the accuracy of which we recognize, and the citizens of Gettysburgh indorse; that he remained there for months, going over the field with wounded men of both armies, carefully noting their descriptions of the battle, and indicating the positions of their commands on his sketch; that he visited the Army at the front, submitting his notes to the assembled officers of the different regiments, verifying the data obtained at Gettysburgh, and fully establishing the position of every command, noting its movements and incidents in battle; that on his invitation many of us visited the battle-field for the purpose of contributing our knowledge to its history, where in council we verified our positions and explained our movements; that many of our comrades in battle who furnished him material and personal reminiscences when at the front fell in the subsequent battles before Richmond, and many others who went with us to Gettysburgh are now dead, and Mr. Bachelder holds the only notes of their experience from which a connected narrative can be written; and, in a word, that throughout the past sixteen years he has given his time and the best efforts of his life to perpetuate the history of the battle of Gettysburgh; that his efforts in collecting material have been crowned with wonderful success; that his verity and impartiality have won alike the encomiums of distinguished officers of both armies; that his knowledge and authority on matters pertaining to that battle have been recognized by the War Department, in employing him to locate the positions of troops on the Government maps of that battle; that we, members of the Society of the Army of the Potomac, officers who led that army at that battle, fully realizing the value which the material collected by Mr. Bachelder must possess for all time, and knowing that if lost it can never be replaced, and that unless it is compiled by him who collected it and knows its value, it will be lost at his death, and to a great extent die with him: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That Congress be respectfully urged to give the subject its early attention, and that the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers and Secretary of War, (printed in Senate Document No. 42,) asking that an adequate appropriation be made to continue, compile, and complete this great work in the same careful, painstaking, liberal manner as has heretofore characterized the enterprise, and our secretary be instructed to forward copies of this resolution to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BECK presented the petition of Samuel Castleman, of Louisville, Kentucky, praying compensation for services as clerk in the assistant adjutant-general's office at Louisville, Kentucky; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KIRKWOOD presented a petition of citizens of Indianola, Iowa, praying Congress to increase the pension of A. W. Richards, late of Company G, Third Iowa Infantry Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BECK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1426) for the relief of Samuel Castleman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GARLAND asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1427) to amend the judiciary act as to suits against certain corporations; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SAULSBURY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1428) relating to the redemption of United States legal-tender notes; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask that that bill be read at length.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be reported at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, in redeeming United States legal-tender notes as required by the act of Congress approved January 14, 1875, to pay to each and every person, bank, corporation, or association of persons presenting said notes for redemption, 75 per cent. of the amount of said notes so presented in gold coin, and 25 per cent. in legal-tender silver dollars.

Mr. WALLACE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1429) granting a pension to Elizabeth F. Long; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KIRKWOOD (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1430) for the relief of Daniel M. Cook; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1431) making further appropriation for continuing the construction of the canal and locks around the Cascades of the Columbia River; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1432) to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. ROLLINS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1433) to regulate the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAWES (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1434) to compensate George W. Morse for his labor and expenses in adapting his system of breech-loading fire-arms and ammunition to the arms of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1435) authorizing the appointment of Dr. Junius L. Powell an assistant surgeon in the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. EUSTIS. I ask leave to introduce a bill making an appropriation for constructing, rebuilding, and repairing levees on the Mississippi River, and I give notice that I shall ask leave of the Senate to submit some remarks upon the bill on Thursday of next week at the expiration of the morning hour. Meanwhile let it lie on the table.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1436) appropriating money for constructing, rebuilding, and repairing levees on the Mississippi River in the States of Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WITHERS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 43) repealing so much of joint resolution No. 46, approved March 2, 1867, as requires proof of loyalty by soldiers of the war of 1812 and their widows in applications for bounty land; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WALLACE, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Thomas P. Blair be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

ADVANCEMENT OF AGRICULTURAL INTERESTS.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Whereas agriculture is the foundation of nearly all our wealth and it is mainly through the exportation of its products that we are paying off our large indebtedness, foreign and domestic, and have the present large balance of trade in our favor; and

Whereas although about one-half of the people of this country are engaged in agricultural pursuits and all other interests are dependent upon this, our leading and most important interest, commercial and otherwise, yet but little has been done by the General Government to promote agriculture, while other less general and important interests have been largely aided: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the committees on agriculture of the respective Houses be, and they are hereby, instructed to consider generally the subject of agriculture, and report, by bill or otherwise, what can or ought to be done by the General Government to better advance, encourage, and foster agricultural interests, and that said committees shall have the power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I wish to state that at some not distant day I expect to call the resolution up for the purpose of submitting some remarks upon the subject. I move that the resolution lie on the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN SURVEYS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, (by request,) submitted the following resolutions; which were referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 3,000 copies of the report of the Geographical and Geological Survey of the Rocky Mountain Region relating to the geology of the Black Hills, in quarto form, with the necessary illustrations and charts; 1,500 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 500 for the use of the Senate, 500 for the use of the survey, and 500 for the use of the Smithsonian Institution, the illustrations and charts to be made by the Public Printer, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

Resolved by the Senate, (the House concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 3,000 copies of the report of the Geographical and Geological Survey of the Rocky Mountain Region, being volume 2, contributions to North American Ethnology, in quarto form; 1,500 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 500 for the use of the Senate, 500 for the use of the survey, and 500 for the use of the Smithsonian Institution.

Resolved by the Senate, (the House concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 3,000 copies of the report of the Geographical and Geological Survey of the Rocky Mountain Region, relating to the geology of the high plateaus of Utah, in quarto form, with the necessary illustrations and charts; 1,500 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 500 for the use of the Senate, 500 for the use of the survey, and 500 for the use of the Smithsonian Institution; the illustrations and charts to be made by the Public Printer, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1625) granting a pension to Abram V. Miller, late lieutenant in Company E of the One hundred and eighty-fourth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 824) establishing the rank of the senior inspector-general;

A bill (S. No. 1133) for the relief of William Gibson; and

A bill (S. No. 1367) to aid in the protection of the public buildings and property against loss and damage by fire.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 5219) granting a pension to Belinda McDonald;

A bill (H. R. No. 5220) to amend an act approved August 14, 1876, entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and for other purposes."

A bill (H. R. No. 5230) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 5231) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense and for the armament thereof for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 201) proposing an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the payment of claims of disloyal persons for property injured or destroyed in the late war of the rebellion.

PREVENTION OF EPIDEMIC DISEASES.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the resolution that I had the honor to submit on Monday last on the subject of the epidemic that prevailed last summer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be reported at length.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the epidemic which has recently prevailed in large districts of several of the States of the Union has been so destructive to human life and the interests and prosperity of the whole country as to make it a subject of gravest public concern, and its prevention in future an important duty, to the end that its return may be prevented, so far as prompt and decided action can prevent:

Be it resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That a joint select committee of four Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and five Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House, be appointed to investigate and report the best means of preventing the introduction and spread of epidemic diseases, especially yellow fever and cholera, within the limits of the United States; that said committee be allowed a clerk and, if in the course of its investigations it is found necessary, a stenographer; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to employ experts and scientists, not to exceed seven in number, and send them to, and by subcommittee visit, recently infected localities, for the purpose of obtaining the fullest and most accurate information; and that said committee may report at any time during the present session of Congress, by bill or otherwise.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. It is before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Tennessee the propriety of so amending his resolution as to make the committee which this body authorizes a committee of the Senate, with power, if the Senator likes, to act in concurrence with any similar committee of the House of Representatives, for the Senate has on a good many occasions, when attention has been drawn to it, been adversely inclined in respect to having joint committees. It has been thought hitherto (and I, certainly, have always thought so) that the independence, indeed the good-will of the two bodies, is much better subserved, as well as their convenience, by having their committees separate in respect of matters of this kind and every other, except some executive act like having charge of the Library, and in fact there they are practically separate. If it is agreeable to the Senator, I should like to move to amend the resolution so as to make this committee a committee of five Senators or seven Senators, whichever he prefers, with a clause that they shall have power to sit and act in concurrence with any similar committee of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HARRIS. The suggestion of the Senator from Vermont is one that I considered when drafting my resolution, and his suggestion would be even preferable to the form in which I put the resolution but for one single reason, and that is that if we raise a Senate committee to investigate the questions involved, and if there be also a House committee, it will result in the conducting of two investigations, or the existence of two committees engaged in investigating the same matter, when, in my judgment, one committee would investigate it just as satisfactorily and at very much less expense. It is perfectly agreeable to me, even more agreeable, to have a committee of the Senate of five, seven, or nine members—I care not as to the number so that it reaches as high as five or seven—than to have a joint committee, and I have no objection to it except the one I have suggested. If that objection is not appreciated by the Senate, I prefer a Senate committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think that the objection ought to outweigh the consideration I have presented, and I do not think that, in point of fact, in practice the objection would exist at all. If the House of Representatives desires to inquire into this, undoubtedly very important, subject, and wishes to raise a committee also, then the House of Representatives will be quite as willing, instead of having a joint committee, to authorize its committee to act in concurrence with a similar committee of the Senate. Then, of course, the responsible and respectable gentlemen on the two committees would arrange for joint sittings, as is the practice in all the States that I know anything about, where they always have independent committees; and if a subject is under common investigation in the two Houses, the two committees arrange to take only one set of testimony and sit together. Then they report according to their respective views to their two Houses; which preserves the entire independency and good feeling that ought to exist between the two Houses on all occasions.

I will run the risk, as it is agreeable personally to my friend, of moving to so amend this resolution as to make it a committee of five Senators——

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will modify the resolution so as to make it to consist of seven instead of five I shall very cheerfully accept his suggestion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

Mr. HARRIS. I should prefer a separate committee but for the reason that I have suggested. Here is a copy of the resolution. [Handing copy.] The Senator will please make the modifications.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to strike out the word "joint" in the second line, and the word "four" in the same line before "Senators," and insert in lieu of "four" the word "seven;" after "Senators" and before "appointed" to strike out "to;" and then to strike out the words "and five Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House;" so as to read:

That a select committee of seven Senators be appointed by the President of the Senate, &c.

And then strike out the words "be appointed" before the words "to investigate and report the best means," &c.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont proposes to amend the resolution so as to make it read as will now be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. The resolution, if amended as proposed, will read:

Be it resolved by the Senate, That a select committee of seven Senators be appointed by the President of the Senate to investigate and report the best means of preventing the introduction and spread of epidemic diseases, especially yellow fever and cholera, within the limits of the United States; that said committee be allowed a clerk and, if in the course of its investigations it is found necessary, a stenographer; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to employ experts and scientists, not to exceed seven in number, and send them to, and by subcommittee visit, recently infected localities, for the purpose of obtaining the fullest and most accurate information; and that said committee may report at any time during the present session of Congress by bill or otherwise.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will move to amend further by striking out the words in the last line "at any time during the present session of Congress;" so as to read "may report by bill or otherwise." It is the same thing; these words are mere surplusage, of no account in any way. The amendment is a mere matter of form.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the line of what I have suggested, for the convenience that has been spoken of, for the committees of the Senate and House to act together if they see fit, I move to add to the resolution:

And that said committee have power to sit and act in concurrence with any similar committee of the House of Representatives.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To this amendment the Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HARRIS. None whatever. The amendment is made necessary by making it a Senate committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to say one word in reference to one aspect of this subject. As I have said, of course it is one that interests everybody, as it ought; but the question has occurred to my mind as to what clause of the Constitution it is that would authorize Congress by a law to provide for the prevention of any epidemic disease, except in the nature of a quarantine on the external boundaries of the United States, where it has been supposed under some authority or other we have power to act. It is true that if we have no power, that would be no valid objection to this resolution of inquiry, because, I take it, nobody would question under the general-welfare clause the power of either House of Congress to inquire into any subject they like, and an inquiry even alone may throw great light upon the subject and enable States to do better than otherwise. There may be some authority drawn from the commercial clause of the Constitution as to the regulation of commerce between the States, possibly, or there may be some other which would justify legislation. I should like to hear the views of my honorable friend from Tennessee upon that subject.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, upon the point suggested by the Senator from Vermont, I have only to say that I have not investigated the question as to the extent of the power of Congress to legislate upon questions of public health, but have supposed that under the power to regulate commerce ample power may be found for such legislation as may be necessary; but, as suggested by the Senator from Vermont, it is not necessary to discuss or determine the extent of the constitutional power to legislate upon the subject at this stage of the proceeding, that being one of the questions that will be investigated and reported upon by the committee, and in the progress of that investigation I hope to have the valuable aid of the Senator from Vermont in finding the power necessary to apply whatever preventive remedy may be thought most effective. The importance of the investigation provided for by the resolution under consideration is so obvious as not to require either explanation or argument. So great have been the calamities of the people of the recently infected districts resulting from the epidemic which prevailed during the last summer as to have excited a profound sympathy throughout the civilized world, and a charity as broad, generous, and munificent as the necessities of the occasion were great. The people of every State in the Union, North and South, East and West, as well as those of almost every nation in the civilized world, responded to the necessities of the sufferers in the stricken localities with most generous and lavish hands. If the recurrence of such calamities as have so seriously afflicted a large portion of the American people within the last few months can be prevented by any action of Congress, none can doubt the importance or the duty of applying the most effectual remedy before the return of another summer. I therefore hope that the resolution may be adopted and the matter promptly and thoroughly investigated, so that if there be a means of preventing the introduction and spread of epidemics so destructive to human life, it may be promptly applied.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. As amended, will the Senate agree to the resolution?

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate agree to the preamble?

The preamble was agreed to.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. President, in the last days of the last session of this body, I gave notice that on this day I would move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 942, relating to the Texas Pacific Railroad, in respect to which I had the honor to submit some remarks yesterday. I desire now to submit that motion.

My object is to bring the bill before the Senate for consideration, for discussion so far as Senators desire to have it discussed, and that it may be disposed of finally by a vote of the Senate according to the rules of the Senate as soon as the convenience of a majority of the body may require it. My object is to have it taken up now. If any one is not ready to speak and desires, however, to be heard upon the bill, it can be laid aside informally and so not stand in the way of the transaction of any other business of the Senate. Inasmuch as the Senate is not clogged at present by any public business of any imperative importance, I trust that the motion will prevail.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Ohio if he is advised whether any Senator desires to speak on the question to-day?

Mr. MATTHEWS. I do not know of any Senator who wishes to be heard to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would suggest in that connection, as there are quite a number of Senators who are not yet in their seats this session, it would be hardly proper, I should think, to take up a subject of such magnitude with a view of bringing it to a vote at once.

Mr. MATTHEWS. The Senator probably did not understand that I said it was not my intention to precipitate a vote upon the bill, or to urge a vote even, any sooner than according to the rules of the Senate and the wishes of a majority of the Senate it might be convenient to do so. I desire that every gentleman who wishes to be heard upon the measure shall be heard, and I do not wish in any way to even reap an advantage, much less take one, from the absence of any gentlemen who are opposed to the measure. I simply desire to put the bill in the way and in the course of disposition, so that it may have its place and be disposed of at an early day in the session, as soon as it can be properly disposed of.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think there can be no objection, if any Senator desires to discuss the question, to taking the bill up; but I can see very great objection to taking it up with a view of pressing it to a vote at this early day in the session, when so many Senators are not present.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, this question is altogether too important to be pressed in the first week of the session. I am very sure that the measure will not lose its place so long as the Senator from Ohio is here to back it up, but I should regret that a discussion should be forced upon the Senate before members are prepared at all to discuss it intelligently. I have no doubt that there will be many speeches on this subject before it can be finally disposed of; but in the first week of the session it seems to me entirely different from our usual practice to bring forward a measure of this magnitude for immediate discussion and disposal. I trust, therefore, the Senator from Ohio will not insist upon bringing the question up day by day in the very first week of the session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of the Texas Pacific Railroad bill.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 19, noes 22.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I desire to give notice that when the bill is taken up I shall submit certain amendments which I hold in my hand, and I move that they now be printed and laid on the table.

The motion to print was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask that the Military Academy and fortification appropriation bill just received from the House of Representatives be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will lay those bills and other bills received from the House of Representatives before the Senate.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

A bill (H. R. No. 5230) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5231) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes;

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 201) proposing an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the payment of claims of disloyal persons for property injured or destroyed in the late war of the rebellion was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 5219) granting a pension to Belinda McDonald was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. No. 5220) to amend an act approved August 14, 1876, entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and for other purposes," was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there further business of the morning hour? [A pause.] Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Calendar of general roders?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I believe there are some messages which have been received to-day.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; after twenty-two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at one o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 4, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular business for this morning, fixed by assignment under suspension of the rules, or unanimous consent, which is equivalent, is the consideration of the bill coming over from last session, known as the Geneva award bill (H. R. No. 4553) to provide for the further distribution of the moneys received under the Geneva award.

Mr. KNOTT. Mr. Speaker, in consequence of the absence of a number of gentlemen who feel a deep interest in this measure, especially several members of the Judiciary Committee who desire to be heard, I respectfully ask, at their request, that the consideration of this bill be postponed by unanimous consent until next Tuesday, to have then the same privileges which it now has upon the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. REAGAN. I have no objection to making this order if it is not to interfere with the previous order with reference to the bill relating to interstate commerce.

Mr. FRYE. I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky to be that this Geneva award bill shall come up next Tuesday with the same rights and privileges which it now has.

Mr. KNOTT. Precisely so.

Mr. FRYE. That is, to continue before the House from day to day until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The order of the House on this subject will be read, so that the exact position of the bill may be understood.

The Clerk read as follows:

June 1, 1878, the bill reported without amendment, made the special order for Wednesday, December 4, 1878, after the reading of the Journal, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say, in reply to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] that this special order now interferes with the unfinished business in which the gentleman from Texas is interested; and if this special order is to retain all its rights, as proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky and as understood by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] it will of course still interfere with the other bill to the extent of taking precedence of it as a subject of consideration.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I do not consent to the proposition, because the bill to which I have referred is one about which there is a great deal of anxiety, and I must insist upon its retaining its place.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to inquire whether the bill referred to by the gentleman from Texas was not itself a special order; whether it is not thus in the nature of a special order having the position of unfinished business and therefore entitled to priority over a new special order?

The SPEAKER. The memory of the Chair is not exact on that point. The order of the House will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House bill No. 3547, to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers, pending when the morning hour expired, May 9, and made a special order for May 11 after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is correct; the bill has attached to it the characteristic of unfinished business.

Mr. GARFIELD. My suggestion of course is not made in hostility to either of these measures, because I want to hear both discussed; but it occurs to me further that perhaps the six days' rule may stand in the way of one or both of these bills.

The SPEAKER. As to the Geneva award bill a particular day was fixed for its consideration under a suspension of the rules, which suspended the operation of the six days' rule as well as all others inconsistent with this order of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then the six days' rule would not apply to that bill, but it would to the other.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not; otherwise the House would have inserted some qualification of that kind in the order. The Chair hears no objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky, and it is agreed to.

REPRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask unanimous consent that House bill No. 4247, a bill reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency and proposing to retire the national-bank circulation, be ordered to be printed.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

SURVEY OF ROCKY MOUNTAIN REGION.

Mr. EDEN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 3,000 copies of the report of the Geographical and Geological Survey of the Rocky Mountain Region relating to the Geology of the High Plateaus of Utah, in quarto form, with the necessary illustrations and charts; 1,500 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 500 for the use of the Senate, 500 for the use of the survey, and 500 for the use of the Smithsonian Institution; the illustrations and charts to be made by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

Mr. EDEN also, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 3,000 copies of the report of the Geographical and Geological Survey of the Rocky Mountain Region, being volume 2, Contributions to North American Ethnology, in quarto form; 1,500 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 500 for the use of the Senate, 500 for the use of the survey, and 500 for the use of the Smithsonian Institution.

GEOLOGY OF THE BLACK HILLS.

Mr. EDEN also, by unanimous consent, submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House, (the Senate concurring therein,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 3,000 copies of the report of the Geographical and Geological Survey of the Rocky Mountain Region relating to the Geology of the Black Hills, in quarto form, with the necessary illustrations and charts; 1,500 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 500 for the use of the Senate, 500 for the use of the survey, and 500 for the use of the Smithsonian Institution, the illustrations and charts to be made by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on the Public Printing.

COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE WITH SOUTH AMERICA.

Mr. WOOD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State and the Postmaster-General be requested to communicate to this House any information received by them, or either of them, since last session of Congress in relation to the commercial and postal intercourse between the United States and the countries of South America.

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

Mr. SCHLEICHER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the House of Representatives, if in his judgement compatible with the public interest, a copy of a dispatch dated October 9, 1878, addressed to the Secretary of State by the United States minister in Mexico, together with a copy of a communication accompanying said dispatch, upon the subject of commercial relations between the United States and that country.

WATER RENTS, ETC., HOT SPRINGS, ARKANSAS.

Mr. FINLEY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish this House a detailed statement of the amounts collected at the Hot Springs in Arkansas for taxes and water rents, showing what sums, if any, have been collected for taxes and ground rents, what, if any, for water rents, and whether said water rents have been collected upon bath-tubs or from invalids, and if from bath-tubs, how much is collected per tub or bath; if from invalids, how much per capita; or whether said water rents have been collected in any other manner, and how such sums, if any have been collected, have been disbursed or disposed of, and under what law said collections and disbursements have been made, and to what person or persons said disbursements have been made, and how much to each person.

ERROR OF ENROLLMENT.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask by unanimous consent to introduce a bill (H. R. No. 5307) to correct an error of enrollment in the bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes. As it is to correct an error of enrollment of a bill of the last session, I hope there will be no objection to its consideration at this time. In addition to the legislation heretofore proposed there is an addition in the pending bill to pay the commissioners since the 25th of June last, and that is the only addition.

Mr. EDEN. Let the bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The bill will first be read, and the Chair will then ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $27,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to pay for clerk hire, engineering, marshal's fees, salaries, and other expenses of the Hot Springs commission; and the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint three discreet, competent, and disinterested persons, who shall constitute a board of commissioners, any two of whom shall constitute a quorum, who shall hold their offices for the period of one year from the date of their appointment, and shall have the same powers and authority in all respects as was provided for the commissioners appointed under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1877, entitled "An act in relation to the Hot Springs reservation, in the State of Arkansas;" which act is hereby revived and continued in full force for the purpose of enabling said board of commissioners to take possession of all records, papers, and proofs, and to determine the claims presented to the board of commissioners appointed under said act, whose term of office has expired, and to do and perform all other acts and duties authorized by said act; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to lease to the present proprietors of the Arlington Hotel, or their assigns, the grounds, not exceeding one acre, now occupied by them, for a period of ten years, unless otherwise provided by law, at an annual rental of $1,000; and he is further directed to lease the bath-houses of a permanent nature now upon the Hot Springs reservation to the owners of the same, and lease to any person or persons, upon such terms as may be agreed on, sites for the building of other bath-houses, for the term of five years, unless otherwise provided by law, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe; and the tax imposed shall not exceed $15 per tub per annum, including land rent: Provided, That said leases shall in no way prejudice any legal right that any person or persons may have acquired under the act hereby revived and continued to any improvements on said ground: And provided further, That to prevent monopoly, no bath-house or hotel shall be supplied with more than enough water for forty bath-tubs of the usual size, unless there shall be more than enough hot water to supply all other demands for the same, in which case no single establishment shall be allowed more than forty bath-tubs of the usual size.

In cases were fractions of lots are made by straightening, widening, or laying out streets, the commissioners shall have power to determine the disposal of the same, giving the preference to the owners of abutting lots: Provided, That all titles given, or to be given by the United States, shall explicitly exclude the right to the purchaser of the land, his heirs or assigns, from ever boring thereon for hot water, and the Hot Springs, with the reservation and mountain, are hereby dedicated to the United States, and shall forever remain free from sale or alienation.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the late commissioners, employed since the 25th of June last, under the request of the Secretary of the Interior, by direction of the President, shall be allowed the necessary expenses incurred by them in forwarding the work, and compensation for their services at the rate provided by the act creating the commission approved March 3, 1877, the disbursements to be made as authorized by said act; and for this purpose the unexpended balance of the appropriation made December 15, 1877, for continuing the work of the Hot Springs commission, amounting to $9,324.80, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby reappropriated and made available.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDEN. I wish to reserve all points of order until we learn something more about the matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will preserve the rights of all gentlemen.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I desire to ask my colleague [Mr. ATKINS] how this mistake occurred. Very grave intimations have been made affecting very high officers of the Government as well as employés of the one branch and the other of Congress, and I would like to know how the mistake happened.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee one question back of that.

Mr. HAMILTON rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs that but one gentleman will speak at a time. To whom does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to hear all the questions that may be addressed to me on this subject. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HAMILTON.]

Mr. HAMILTON. That bill was enrolled by Mr. RAINEY, of South Carolina. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether or not he intends to cast any reflections on the honorable gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. ATKINS. It is not a matter of fact that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAINEY] enrolled the bill. He simply read the bill. I do not cast any reflections on Mr. RAINEY. On the contrary I stand here to compliment him on his faithfulness and his extraordinary labor on that memorable night. I think the gentleman from South Carolina discharged his whole duty. I will now hear the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman the only question I am interested in just now, which is to know whether the bill we have just heard read is an exact copy of what the House and the Senate passed?

Mr. ATKINS. It is, with the addition of the second section, which provides for the payment of these commissioners who have acted by the request of the Secretary of the Interior, on the suggestion of the President, of the 25th June last.

Mr. GARFIELD. That being the case, I think, on the faith of what the gentleman from Tennessee has stated, there should be no objection to the passage of the bill at this time.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire now to answer the question of my colleague, [Mr. WHITTHORNE.] Of course, I do not know, Mr. Speaker, how this accident or this event happened. I do not know whether the legislation was abstracted intentionally or whether it was lost. But I will state this, that after it was omitted from the enrolled bill, I felt it to be my duty to address a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury urging him to use the detective force of his Department to ascertain the truth of this matter. He has made some investigations, and a report of them has been made and addressed to myself, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, which report I design at an early day to lay before our committee. Of course, I do not myself know anything about the facts.

The SPEAKER. In this connection the Chair desires to state that the Clerk of the House, the enrolling officer in chief, Mr. King, and the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RAINEY,] have all called upon the Chair and requested there should be an investigation into this subject. They demand this investigation as a right, feeling confident that they will be fully and entirely vindicated. The Chair said in reply to them he was ready at any moment to recognize any one who sought to introduce the subject for the consideration of the House. The Chair thinks it due to the officers mentioned and to the gentleman from South Carolina to make this statement.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question in reference to the new section in this bill. It seems that there is a new section added to the bill that was not embraced in the clause in the sundry civil bill at the last session. This new section proposes to pay these commissioners, I suppose, the same compensation that they have been receiving under the law, upon the ground or theory that they have been acting at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior. I cannot see upon what theory we can pay these commissioners anything. They did not occupy any official position, and there is no act that they could do that would have any legal or binding effect upon anybody; and it occurs to me it would be setting a wrong example to allow the Secretary of the Interior or anybody else to request somebody to act in an official capacity when there is no law authorizing it; to act in that way for months and months, and then to come to Congress for an appropriation. It is true this mistake that occurred in the enrolling of the bill presented an extraordinary case. Nevertheless there was no law under which these men could act as commissioners, and the Secretary of the Interior had no right to appoint any such officers. There are no such officers known to the law; and if we set an example of this sort the probability is we will be constantly called upon to make appropriations for somebody who has been acting in some sort of capacity at the request of a Cabinet officer or somebody else. I think this is a bad precedent, and I object to this action unless my doubts upon that point can be removed.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to say just one word in reply. I will admit, as a general principle, that the gentleman from Illinois is correct in the position he takes; but, sir, such an instance will probably not occur again in ten, or twenty, or thirty years. I do not know when such a case as this has occurred. I do not know that any such instance has occurred as in this case. I admit that in some way some words or sentences have dropped out of the legislation relating to this entire subject. Now these commissioners were acting under the law, and it was the intention of Congress to continue that law. It had passed the House, and had been sent to the enrolling-room for enrollment, and there this mistake occurred. The House had nothing further to do with it. The House had passed judgment upon it, and there was nothing left but for the Speaker to attach his name to the bill containing this provision, and when he signed the bill he thought that that legislation was incorporated in it. I say for that reason that the principle suggested by the gentleman is not analogous to the case, because it would be a great hardship for that commission not to have been continued. The interests of the United States required it as well as the interests of individuals; and therefore I think that the Secretary of the Interior did not commit any very great breach of duty in appointing the commission to continue the service, and it is now for Congress to correct the evil. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his objection to the bill and allow it to come before the House.

Mr. EDEN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] has not answered the objection I made at all. I have made no point as to the necessity of this legislation; that seems to have been passed upon by the last House. We are constantly making precedents of this kind, and the precedent made in this case may be used hereafter in accomplishing a bad object.

Mr. ATKINS. Does the gentleman intend to take the position that these commissioners have no right to their pay because they were not acting under the law of the 25th of June last?

Mr. EDEN. I take the position that there is no act which they have done that can have any legal or binding effect upon any one; but I do not propose to take the responsibility upon myself of objecting to the payment to this commission. I will not insist on the point of order; if the House sees fit to pass the bill it can do so and I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman now has the absolute right to object to the present consideration of the bill. As the Chair understands the gentleman, he does not object to its consideration.

Mr. EDEN. I do not object to the correction of the error made at the last session.

Mr. ATKINS. If there is a single gentleman on the floor who objects to the second section of the bill, I will withdraw it.

Mr. EDEN. I do object to the second section of the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. Then I withdraw it.

Mr. EDEN. If the gentleman withdraws that section, I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. Of course a single objection is fatal to the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. SPARKS. If the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw that single section there will be no objection to the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. Then I withdraw the second section of the bill; I do it under compulsion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his objection, it being understood that the second section of the bill is withdrawn.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New York. Do I understand that this bill is what was left out at the last session?

The SPEAKER. Exactly.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New York. Then, there should not be the slightest objection to the passage of this bill.

The bill, as modified, was read, as follows:

A bill to correct an error of enrollment in bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of $27,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to pay for clerk hire, engineering, marshal's fees, salaries, and other expenses of the Hot Springs commission; and the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint three discreet, competent, and disinterested persons, who shall constitute a board of commissioners, any two of whom shall constitute a quorum, who shall hold their offices for the period of one year from the date of their appointment, and shall have the same powers and authority in all respects as was provided for the commissioners appointed under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1877, entitled "An act in relation to the Hot Springs reservation in the State of Arkansas;" which act is hereby revived and continued in full force for the purpose of enabling said board of commissioners to take possession of all records, papers, and proofs, and to determine the claims presented to the board of commissioners appointed under said act, whose term of office has expired, and to do and perform all other acts and duties authorized by said act. And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to lease to the present proprietors of the Arlington Hotel, or their assigns, the grounds, not exceeding one acre, now occupied by them, for a period of ten years, unless otherwise provided by law, at an annual rental of $1,000; and he is further directed to lease the bath-houses of a permanent nature now upon the Hot Springs reservation to the owners of the same, and lease to any person or persons, upon such terms as may be agreed on, sites for the building of other bath-houses for the term of five years, unless otherwise provided by law, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe; and the tax imposed shall not exceed $15 per tub per annum, including land rent: Provided, That said leases shall in no way prejudice any legal right that any person or persons may have acquired under the act hereby revived and continued to any improvements on said ground: And provided further, That to prevent monopoly, no bath-house or hotel shall be supplied with more than enough water for forty bath-tubs of the usual size, unless there shall be more than enough hot water to supply all other demands for the same, in which case no single establishment shall be allowed more than forty bath-tubs of the usual size.

In cases where fractions of lots are made by straightening, widening, or laying out streets, the commissioners shall have power to determine the disposal of the same, giving the preference to the owners of abutting lots: Provided, That all titles given or to be given by the United States shall explicitly exclude the right to the purchaser of the land, his heirs or assigns, from ever boring thereon for hot water; and the Hot Springs, with the reservation and mountain, are hereby dedicated to the United States, and shall remain forever free from sale or alienation.

Mr. VEEDER. I move to amend by inserting, after the word "appoint," "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." I understand that to be acceptable.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I have an amendment to offer, in order to correct what was an omission of myself. I think that when it is read it will commend itself to the entire judgment of the House.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert, after the words "more than forty bath-tubs of the usual size:"

And provided further, That the superintendent shall provide and maintain a sufficient number of free baths for the use of the indigent, and the expense thereof shall be defrayed out of the rentals hereinbefore provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEPOSITS OF MONEY BELONGING TO THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration and adoption at this time the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House whether any money belonging to the Treasury of the United States was in possession and custody of any national or State bank or private banker on the 30th of September and November, 1878, as on deposit or otherwise other than deposits made by disbursing agents, and to state the name and location of the banks or bankers who held such money and the amount held by each respectively.

There being no objection, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. KELLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. FRYE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5308) to amend chapter 261 of the laws passed during the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress increasing the pensions of certain pensioned soldiers and sailors; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

URIAH W. BRIGGS.

Mr. FRYE also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5309) increasing the pension of Uriah W. Briggs; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire to move to reconsider a reference which was made yesterday. The letter of the Secretary of the Interior relative to the value of lands proposed to be purchased for the site of the Congressional Library was by mistake referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I desire to move to reconsider that reference, and that the communication be referred to the Committee on the Library and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

JACOB L. SHINN.

Mr. GUNTER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5310) for the relief of Jacob L. Shinn, of Pope County, Arkansas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SALLY MURRAY BUCHANAN.

Mr. SWANN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5311) granting a pension to Sally Murray Buchanan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

TIMBER DEPREDATIONS.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration and adoption at this time the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the House of Representatives with an account of all moneys expended by the Department of Justice in prosecutions for timber depredations in the State of Mississippi, and that he furnish the House with the number of suits instituted, number dismissed, number successfully prosecuted, and number of cases still pending, and with the accounts of the marshal of the southern district of Mississippi in each and every of said suits, and that he give a detailed statement of accounts presented by said marshal to his department, whether the same have been paid and allowed or not; and that he also furnish to this House a statement of all contracts and with amounts paid or agreed to be paid to any and all attorneys employed in aid of the regular attorney of the Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the adoption of this resolution?

Mr. CONGER. I object to it now.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move that the House now adjourn.

SILVER DOLLAR.

Mr. FORT. I ask consent to offer a resolution for adoption at this time.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will hear it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the legal-tender quality of silver dollars of 412½ grains of standard silver shall be maintained and enforced, and that any discrimination against said silver dollars by any national banking association, by refusing to receive them and treat them as legal dollars, shall be deemed a defiance of the laws of the United States. And the Committee on Banking and Currency is hereby instructed to mature and bring in a bill to provide for the withdrawal of the circulating notes of all such banks so offending.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I object to that.

Mr. BEEBE. It is a proposition to resolve that the obedience of the law is a defiance of it.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am willing to have that resolution passed.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I object to it.

Mr. FORT. I would like to have it referred.

The SPEAKER. It is objected to by several members.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. COX, of New York, that the House adjourn. Upon a division there were—ayes 145, noes 47.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, there being 21 in the affirmative; not one-fifth of the last vote.

So the motion to adjourn was agreed to; and accordingly (at one o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BLISS: The petition of Isaac L. Dusenberry and Margaret Dusenberry, for the correction of the military record of Isaac L. Dusenberry, late a private in Company F, One hundred and seventy-third Regiment New York Volunteers—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BRIGHT: Papers relating to the bill to relieve Alexander & Co. from a penalty imposed upon them for an alleged violation of the United States revenue laws—to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. DAVIS, of California: The petition of night inspectors of customs for San Francisco, for an increase of their pay—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama: Papers relating to the claim of Thomas L. Shamblin, of Tuscaloosa County, Alabama, for compensation for property taken by the United States Army—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HUNTON: Papers relating to the claim of the heirs of Richard Windsor to have refunded to them the amount paid the United States at a confiscation sale for certain property, which sale has been adjudged illegal and void and the property bought recovered from them—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LUTTRELL: The petition of J. B. Moulton and others, watchmen in the Post-Office Department, for the restoration of their salaries to $720 per annum—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, the petition of Henry C. De Ahna, for compensation for alleged wrongs done him and hardships suffered by him by reason of his removal from the office of collector of customs, district of Alaska—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of citizens of Alaska Territory, for the organization of courts of law therein, accompanied by reports from the officers of the United States and others as to the condition of affairs in said Territory—to the same committee.

By Mr. PRICE: The petition of Joseph Parkins, for extra compensation owing to alterations made in the plan for the construction of a cornice at the Rock Island arsenal—to the Committee of Claims.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 5, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FRANCIS M. COCKRELL, a Senator from the State of Missouri, appeared in his seat to-day.

PREVENTION OF EPIDEMIC DISEASES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. HARRIS, Mr. MATTHEWS, Mr. LAMAR, Mr. PADDOCK, Mr. CONOVER, Mr. GARLAND, and Mr. EUSTIS as the select committee provided for by the resolution adopted by the Senate yesterday relative to the introduction, spread, and prevention of epidemic diseases in the United States.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. WALLACE. I send to the Chair the following list of a few changes in standing committees of this body which have been agreed upon:

Mr. EATON retires from the Committee on Appropriations and Mr. WALLACE takes his place.

Mr. MORGAN retires from the Committee on Patents and Mr. EATON takes his place.

Mr. WALLACE retires from the Committee on Foreign Relations and Mr. MORGAN takes his place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To these changes the Chair hears no objection.

Mr. FERRY. I ask to be excused from service on the special committee appointed yesterday to investigate an omission in the enrollment of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan asks to be excused from service on the special committee appointed yesterday in relation to an omission in the enrollment of the sundry civil bill at the last session of Congress. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and he is excused. The Chair appoints the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to fill the vacancy.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, I am on a special committee charged with another duty, and I ask to be relieved also from service upon the committee just mentioned.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois asks to be relieved from serving on the select committee appointed yesterday in the matter of the omission of the provision in relation to the Hot Springs reservation from the sundry civil bill of last year. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and he is excused.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I must ask the same indulgence——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I made the request, if the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me, because I am on another special committee. That was the only reason I did it. I would have no objection to serve if I were not on another committee of which the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is chairman that will occupy my time.

Mr. DAWES. I am compelled by the course of events to ask the same indulgence of the Senate, and therefore I ask to be excused from service on the committee. I am willing to discharge any duty that the Senate may devolve upon me; but I do not see why Senators should devolve an unpleasant duty upon others in this way, and I ask to be excused also.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate excuse the Senator from Massachusetts from service upon the committee relative to an omission in the enrollment of the sundry civil appropriation bill? The Chair hears no objection, and he is excused.

The vacancies were filled by the appointment of Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Mr. DAWES, and Mr. EATON to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois.

The committee therefore consists of Messrs. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, EATON, and RANDOLPH.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of Patents recommending an appropriation of $28,700 for additional examiners, clerks, and laborers in the Patent Office; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Treasurer of the United States, transmitting copies of accounts rendered to and adjusted with the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 29, 1878; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. These documents are very voluminous, and the Chair will refer the propriety of printing them to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a letter from the Treasurer of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with the requirements of section 311 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, fair and accurate copies of the accounts rendered to and settled with the First Comptroller for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will make a like order in reference to the printing of this communication as in regard to the communication last presented.

EXPENSES OF CALIFORNIA IN INDIAN WARS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following communication from the governor of California; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Sacramento, June 8, 1878.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

The senate and assembly of this State having adopted, on March 30, 1878, resolutions as follows:

"First. That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives requested to urge upon Congress the immediate payment of all bonds, coupons, and certificates of coupons issued by the State of California for expenses incurred in the Indian wars which have not been paid by the General Government; second, that his excellency the governor be requested to cause a statement of all such bonds, certificates, and coupons, and the circumstances connected therewith, to be prepared by the comptroller, and, upon such statement being prepared, to cause an application to be made to Congress, in the name of the State of California, for the payment of said bonds, coupons, and certificates; third, and that he forward a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress;"

And the comptroller having made a statement of the "bonds, coupons, and certificates of coupons issued by the State of California, for expenses incurred in the Indian wars" (a copy of which is hereto appended,) from which statement it appears that there yet remains of such issue of bonds, coupons, and certificates of coupons unpaid by the United States Government the sum of $241,625.62; and the United States Government having, by action heretofore taken, recognized the validity of the bonds, coupons, &c., issued by the State of California for expenses incurred in the Indian wars, and the obligation of the said United States Government to pay the same:

Now, therefore, I, William Irwin, governor of the State of California, do make application to your honorable bodies, in the name of the State, and respectfully ask that you do at once appropriate, of the moneys in the United States Treasury, a sum sufficient to pay "the bonds, coupons, and certificates of coupons issued by the State of California to defray expenses incurred in the Indian wars," and remaining unpaid by the United States Government, as shown by the accompanying report of the comptroller, and direct the payment of the same to the State of California.

[SEAL.] WILLIAM IRWIN,
Governor.

By the governor:
THOMAS BECK, Secretary of State.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of Martha Edwards, of Portland, Maine, widow of Daniel Brown, who was a soldier of the war of 1812, praying to be allowed a pension under the act of February 14, 1871; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of John Smith, of Saccarappa, Cumberland County, Maine, praying to be allowed a pension for wounds received in the service; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DORSEY. I present a petition of 470 residents upon the Hot Springs reservation, asking that the error in a clause of the sundry civil appropriation bill relating to that reservation be rectified. As

I expect to call the matter up during the day, I move that the petition lie on the table for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DORSEY. I also present a memorial of the city council of the same place of the same import as the petition just presented. I move that it also lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WITHERS. I present the petition of William B. Whiting, a commodore in the United States Navy, praying the early consideration by the Senate of Senate bill No. 647, granting him a pension. As the bill is before the Senate, I suppose the petition will lie on the table, to be considered in connection with the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of Henry F. Lines, of Chicago, Illinois, praying compensation for services rendered as cipher clerk and military-telegraph operator in the years 1864 and 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL presented the petition of Walbridge, Holland & Brown, of Saint Louis, Missouri, praying compensation for services rendered the United States as stenographers at Saint Louis, Missouri, in February, 1877; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. While the Senate is comparatively full, I wish to give notice that it is my intention on Monday next to ask the Senate to consider, with a view to action upon it, the bill (S. No. 1308) to amend sundry provisions of chapter 1, title 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to presidential elections, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon. This, as everybody understands, is a very important subject that was reported upon by bill on the 24th of May, 1878, by a select committee having charge of that subject. It has been laid over until this time, and I hope that Senators between now and Monday will examine the bill and be ready to proceed with its actual business consideration at that time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. After the morning hour?

Mr. EDMUNDS. After the morning hour.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1437) relating to public printing and binding; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1438) making further appropriation for continuing the improvement of the Upper Willamette River, Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1439) making appropriation for further improving the Upper Columbia and Snake Rivers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1440) appropriating $150,000 for continuing the improvement of the Lower Willamette and Columbia Rivers from Portland, Oregon, to the sea; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BOOTH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1441) for the relief of homestead settlers on the public lands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. OGLESBY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1442) granting a pension to Charles C. Merrick; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. EATON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1443) for the relief of vessels of the United States officered by aliens; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

INTERCOURSE WITH SOUTH AMERICA.

Mr. FERRY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to transmit to the Senate any information which may have been received by the Departments concerning postal and commercial intercourse between the United States and South American countries, together with any recommendations, desirable to be submitted, of measures to be adopted for facilitating and improving such intercourse.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to report to the Senate the amount of deposits in the Treasury due to the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company at the end of each year since the appointment of commissioners of the same; whether any interest has been or ought to be allowed upon such deposits; what the annual expenses have been attending the appointment of the commission and its management of the business; what parcels of real estate, if any, which it would be advantageous to the Government of the United States to purchase at a fair valuation; and what legislation would be necessary to finally close up the affairs of the company and allow the commissioners to retire.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I understand that the commissioners are very anxious to retire from further service on this commission, but under existing law it is supposed that they cannot legally relieve themselves from responsibility. My own opinion is that the original managers of this institution ought to have been criminally prosecuted; but I suppose now it is too late. We certainly gave this institution of the Freedman's Bank and Trust Company some sort of credit throughout the country, and are largely responsible, certainly since 1874, for its prudent and efficient management. I understand now that there is a very considerable sum in the Treasury, and that there have been large sums for years past lying idle there. Some further legislation seems to be necessary in order to enable the business of the company to be wound up, and to enable us to have the business conducted at a much less expense.

Mr. THURMAN. I understand that this is a mere resolution of inquiry.

Mr. MORRILL. It asks for information; that is all.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I do not think it has been the custom of the Senate to go to the general Calendar in the first week of the session; and as no business has been prepared, I imagine, during this week, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. ANTHONY. I had hoped that the Senate would take up the Calendar of unobjected cases to-day and to-morrow, and I have prepared a resolution to that effect.

Mr. THURMAN. We might take up the Calendar to-day, but I think we may as well adjourn over at the end of to-day's session until Monday. I think we shall facilitate business by so doing.

Mr. ANTHONY. With a short session to-morrow we might dispose of a considerable number of unobjected cases on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 27, noes 15.

PREVENTION OF EPIDEMIC DISEASES.

Mr. GARLAND submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That so much of the President's message as relates to the yellow fever be referred to the select committee raised under the resolution passed on yesterday to consider the subject of epidemic diseases.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I propose to offer a resolution similar to one that I have offered in several sessions, and which has been received with favor by the Senate; though I confess I do it with some doubt and diffidence. It undoubtedly facilitates the transaction of business, and enables the Senate to reach a great number of cases which have passed through all the preliminary stages of legislation, subjected to careful examination and investigation by committees and reported favorably to the Senate, but which, in the pressure of more important business, are never otherwise reached. Yet at the same time I think it leads to hasty legislation and that a good deal of mischief has been done by passing bills that ought not to be acted upon without further discussion. But on the principle that it is better that ninety-nine guilty persons should escape than that one innocent person should suffer, I offer the resolution, and hope, if it passes, that the guardians of the Treasury will be in their seats to object to cases that ought not to pass.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That to-day at one o'clock the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar, and bills that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once, and for five minutes only, unless, upon motion, the Senate should at any time otherwise order; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings; and this order shall take precedence of special orders or unfinished business, unless otherwise ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. MATTHEWS. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution will go over under the rule.

WALKER'S STATISTICAL ATLAS.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the copies of Walker's Statistical Atlas heretofore ordered for the use of the Senate be bound by the Public Printer.

SENATOR FROM SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I submit the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That 100 copies of the report made to the Committee on Privileges and Elections by Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the matter of the claim of David T. Corbin to a seat in this body as Senator from the State of South Carolina, be printed for the use of said committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is this order reported from the committee?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Then it need not be referred.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

INTERNAL-REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. WITHERS. Near the close of the last session a bill was received from the House of Representatives reducing the tax upon tobacco, and it was referred to the Committee on Finance. As the chairman of that committee is present I take this occasion to express the hope that a speedy report will be made upon that bill, either favorably or unfavorably, because the interest which it is designed to protect and serve is suffering extremely from the uncertainty with regard to the action of Congress upon that subject.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator state the number of the bill?

Mr. WITHERS. I refer to the bill (H. R. No. 4414) to amend the laws relating to internal revenue. It is a bill which proposes to reduce the tax on tobacco from twenty-four cents to sixteen cents a pound. I simply request that prompt action be had in the committee upon the matter for the reasons already assigned.

SURETIES OF GEORGE W. CLARKE.

Mr. DORSEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1038) for the relief of Jesse Turner and others, sureties upon the official bond of George W. Clarke, formerly Indian agent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think it had better go over. We do not know anything about the facts in the case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is whether the Senate will now consider it.

Mr. DORSEY. The bill cannot go over on one objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It cannot. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I thought the order was that objected cases should go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order was proposed to take effect at the expiration of the morning hour. The question is on the motion to consider the bill at this time.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It releases Jesse Turner, James M. Brown, Charles F. Brown, and the estates of S. M. Hays, Hiram Brodie, S. F. Cotterell, P. H. White, and Joseph J. Green, deceased, from any and all liability as the sureties upon the official bond of George W. Clarke, formerly Indian agent; the release to take effect upon the payment of the legal costs heretofore accrued in the prosecution of the claim by the United States. But all the rights and remedies of the Government on the bond as against Clarke shall in no manner be affected, but remain in full force and effect in law.

Mr. MORRILL. Is there any report accompanying the bill?

Mr. DORSEY. There is a report from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORRILL. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. HEREFORD April 4, 1878:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Jesse Turner and others, asking to be relieved from liability as sureties on bond of George W. Clarke, report as follows:

George W. Clarke was appointed Indian agent and gave bonds as such August 19, 1854, in a penalty of $40,000, with S. M. Hays, Phineas H. White, Charles F. Brown, S. F. Cotterell, Hiram Brodie, James M. Brown, Joseph J. Green, and Jesse Turner as sureties. All of the sureties are dead except James M. Brown, Charles F. Brown, and Jesse Turner.

The agent, Clarke, was found to be in default and relieved from duty on December 31, 1856. The amount of the defalcation is found to be $1,245.77.

No further action was taken in this case until December 15, 1875, when each of the parties living was notified.

Suit was instituted March 6, 1877, in the United States district court for the western district of Arkansas.

The above are the facts as gathered from a letter of Hon. K. Rayner, Solicitor of the Treasury, bearing date February 7, 1878, in response to a letter from a member of this committee, to whom the subject had been referred. The following is an affidavit in the case, which is substantiated by several others:

STATE OF ARKANSAS, Crawford County, ss:

I, Augustus J. Ward, of Crawford County, State of Arkansas, do state upon oath, that I have resided at Van Buren, Crawford County, for the last thirty-four years; that I was well acquainted with George W. Clarke, and Samuel M. Hayes, P. H. White, S. F. Cotterell, Hiram Brodie, J. J. Green, Charles F. Brown, James M. Brown, and Jesse Turner, his securities upon his bond as Indian agent, upon which his now reported defalcation occurred in December, 1856. I know that George W. Clarke was the owner of real estate at that time of considerable amount, but do not know what encumbrances, if any, existed against it. His family resided here during most of the time he was in Kansas as Indian agent. Clarke was an energetic man to raise money. All the persons who are named as the securities upon his bond were in solvent circumstances in December, 1856. Since that time, up to the time of the breaking out of the late war, the sum of fifteen hundred dollars could have been made out of any one of them. Since then, the results of the late war and other causes changed the circumstances of all the persons named as Clarke's securities, and most of them are unable to pay who survived the war.

P. H. White died about 1857; he was a merchant, engaged in business at this place; his estate was closed by administration since the war, and did not pay the creditors in full.

Joseph J. Green died in the spring of 1863; his estate was administered upon; after paying his debts but little was left, which was used or expended for the support of his children; the administration has been closed long since.

Samuel M. Hays, one of the securities upon Clarke's bond, died in 1871. His estate has been administered upon; not yet closed. He left some property, both real and personal, but, after the payment of the debts probated against the estate, I think there will be but little left.

Hiram Brodie, one of the securities on Clarke's bond, died in February, 1875. The estate is being administered upon, and I am informed and believe that after the payment of the debts probated against said estate there will be but little left; the property of the estate was small in amount.

Sutton F. Cotterell, another of the reported securities, died about November, 1875, at Little Rock, Arkansas. His estate was insolvent. Had no property, as I am informed.

Charles F. Brown, another of the named securities upon Clarke's bond, is insolvent; has no property; took the benefit of the bankrupt law since the war, and has been discharged; paid his debts in that way.

James M. Brown left this county in 1862; had property in negroes and mules at the time he left here, and some real estate, long since sold. His present circumstances I have no means of knowing, as he resides in the State of Texas.

Jesse Turner I have known intimately for thirty-four years. He is a practicing attorney at this place, advanced in life; has some real estate, and should he have this debt to pay it will greatly embarrass him, and he can only pay it at a great sacrifice of his small amount of property.

I have been engaged in the business of a merchant, most of the time at my residence, at Van Buren, Crawford County, for the past thirty four years, and have, as I believe, the means of knowledge of the matters hereinbefore stated by me.

AUGUSTUS J. WARD.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 15th day of February, A. D. 1878.

JOHN B. OGDEN,
Notary Public.

From the letter of the Solicitor of the Treasury and this affidavit we obtain the following facts:

George W. Clarke, the Indian agent, became defaulter, and his defalcation was known to the Government December 31, 1856. No further action was taken in the matter until December 15, 1875—a space of nineteen years lacking fifteen days—the sureties being uninformed of the defalcation for that space of time. Suit was brought March 6, 1877, which is more than twenty years after the right of action had accrued. If the Government had used proper diligence it is quite probable all or a good portion of the amount could have been made out of the principal. Certainly the other securities could have all been compelled to pay their pro rata of the amount, and these securities relieved to that extent. The Government by its own laches has lost a part of its security, and to that extent has damaged the other remaining securities.

In a case in England it was declared by one of the judges "that long dormant claims have more of cruelty than justice in them, and that Christianity forbids an attempt at enforcing the payment of a debt which time and misfortune have rendered the debtor unable to discharge." (See A'Lourt vs. Cross, 3 Bing. R., 329.)

Of the original eight sureties, five are dead and three living, and possessed of very limited means, perhaps none worth anything, unless it be Jesse Turner, who is a practicing attorney, advanced in years, and owning a small amount of real estate.

Under the circumstances the committee believe that great injustice has been done to the sureties by the delay on the part of the Government, and think that the remaining sureties should be relieved from liability on said bond, and therefore report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I suppose that there is no other objection to this than there is to any other case where bondsmen are called upon to pay what they had agreed to pay in the event of any defalcation of the principal. I see nothing in this except the usual argument that some parties have failed, and that it will be a great hardship upon those who have not failed to pay the Government what they agreed to pay in case of a defalcation. Unless we intend to abandon the whole system of requiring bonds to be given for the faithful performance of these trusts, I certainly cannot see why we should vote in favor of a bill of this character.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, there was no minority report in this case; but as a member of the Committee on Claims I could not concur in the action of the majority. My colleague upon the committee, the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CAMERON,] I believe took the same view of this case that I did. While there was no minority report made, I think the objection stated by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] is a valid objection to the bill, and I shall oppose its passage.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, this bill was before the Senate on the 25th of last April, and some little discussion was then had upon it, and some information was brought out more than the report discloses. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to one particular fact which was disclosed then, and which probably has escaped his memory. George W. Clarke, the principal in this bond, several years after this default on his part, was appointed by the Navy Department to a very high and responsible office, and held that office under that appointment until the commencement of the war between the States.

There is no such thing recognized in the law as that parties shall be required to exercise more than due and proper diligence in any case. You may talk as you please to the effect that the sureties were bound to know that the principal was in default; admit that upon its face to be correct; yet when the Government of the United States appointed this man to a second office, higher and more important and more responsible than the one he formerly held, his sureties might well conclude that the Government was satisfied with this person and had no charge against him upon his previous undertaking with the Government. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy showing a second appointment will be found in the RECORD. I call the attention of the Senator from Vermont, who took his seat a few moments ago, to the RECORD of the 25th of last April.

But there is a higher and loftier consideration lying at the bottom of this matter than I have stated. We know that we read in the books that "no time runs against the king;" that the Government is not bound by a statute of limitations unless specially named in that statute; but whenever the Government has put herself in the position of an individual and has gone into the courts of the country, she has been held to the same degree of diligence and to the same exercise of energy, if I may use the expression, to which an individual is held. In other words, her rights stand no better and no higher in that tribunal than those of the individual who attends before it.

There is a very singular thing in this case, Mr. President. We look at the statutes of the United States and we find that there is no statute of limitation as to official bonds except in the case of marshals. It is possible that some Senator, it may be the Senator from Vermont, can tell me why such a provision was made as to marshals and not as to any other officers of the Government. But if he cannot give the reason, I say that such being the law written upon the statute-book, one reason would seem to be that the law-makers thought Congress was at any time competent to deal with these cases equitably and fairly, as they should be dealt with, regardless of the rigid and the unbending rules that have been established in the courts of law.

Does the Senator tell me or undertake to tell the Senate that in no case is a surety under circumstances of this kind to be relieved? Is there no possible condition under which securities can be relieved? I contend he must lay down that broad principle or he must vote for the relief that is asked in the bill as reported by the Committee on Claims.

Now look for a moment at the circumstances of the case. Time has elapsed amounting to nearly the average period of human life. In that time this part of the world has changed front, really, and sureties who had forgotten they had ever signed such a bond are now brought into the courts of the country to answer this default of their principal, whom the Government honored afterward with a higher and better office, and said to him, "well done, thou good and faithful servant"—a higher and better office than the one he had before and under which this default is claimed to have occurred.

It is produced in testimony here that many of these sureties have died, others have become worthless, and but one now, in the State of Arkansas, is worth the money that is claimed on this bond. He is a high and respectable attorney of that State, and is advanced in years. He is advanced too far, according to the testimony, to turn back upon the path of life and to reinstate himself in his position.

I think if the Senator from Vermont will examine the report clearly and look at the testimony, he cannot withhold his support from the bill. I am now, and I will be, among the last in this Senate to vote indiscriminately for relief of this character; but here is an application which, if any one will take the time to read it, speaks in words louder and better than I can speak for this relief that is proffered. On the face of these proceedings I say the Senator must stand upon the broad principle that in no case can relief be granted, if the relief asked here is not granted to this security. If I am allowed to allude to him, this old gentleman, Mr. Turner, had in the courts of the United States his plea drawn of non est factum, that he never signed such a bond, it having been so long since it was signed and so long since the alleged default occurred.

As for the danger of any precedent, which was incidentally alluded to by the Senator from Vermont, I am not afraid of that kind of argument. I am always prepared to do right in the given case presented to me; and you may bring cases of this kind as often as you please, at every turn of the hand of the clock in the day, if you please, and I shall vote for them, come from what section of the country they may. I ask the Senator from Vermont to read the report in this particular case which was made by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] on behalf of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I am not one of those who contend that there are no cases where relief should be afforded to parties who have signed as sureties for the faithful performance of duties on the part of any office-holder, but at a time like this, when there seems to be almost a universal tendency to defalcation throughout the country, I am not for throwing aside such securities as we have taken to guard the Treasury against loss. In this case it would seem to be contended by the Senator from Arkansas that because this party had so artfully concealed the defalcation that it was not known for years, so that the party himself was intrusted again by the Government with important functions to be discharged officially, therefore we should now excuse the sureties on his bond. Mr. President, there are no facts stated in the report here but what would come up in any case. The allegation simply is that it would be a hardship on the part of these sureties to be compelled to pay the Government what they owe. I trust we shall not set the example of throwing aside such securities as we are bound to take in all similar circumstances.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. President, the facts in this case are very few and very simple. George W. Clarke was appointed Indian agent in 1854, and gave his bond with this party, Mr. Turner, as one of the securities. In 1856 he became a defaulter in the sum of about $1,245. At the time that he became a defaulter, as the evidence shows, the debt could have been made out of the principal if the Government had brought suit. The report furthermore shows that not only could the debt have been made out of the principal, or certainly a great part of it, but also each one of the sureties could have been compelled to pay his pro rata share of that defalcation. Now the Government lays upon its oars for twenty-odd years, till nearly all the securities are dead, and those that are living have become bankrupt and the estates of those that are dead have been settled up and whatever there was has been divided among those to whom it was coming, so that the case now presented to this body is this: Will this Government compel one of the sureties, after the lapse of twenty-odd years, to pay the whole of the debt of this principal?

The Senator from Vermont says that the party is liable. Nobody disputes that; but is the Government in every instance going to make money out of a party simply because he is liable under the law? No, sir. Not only at the last session, but I expect at every session of Congress, parties similarly situated have been relieved by a liberal Government. Time and again last session parties were relieved that came before this body with no more equity in their cases than this.

I recollect one case that was presented to this body by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] where a postmaster had been robbed and there had been no laches on his part. He and his securities were responsible under the law notwithstanding the robbery. The robbery did not relieve him and his securities. And yet this Senate, in its liberality, in its sense of justice, relieved that postmaster and his securities, though he was responsible under the law. Why not, then, relieve this party? Much more the party in this case, I think, ought to be relieved than in that, for the Government in this case, if it had done as it would have been compelled to do if it had been a private citizen, ought to have brought suit soon after the ascertainment of the defalcation. It did not do that, and thereby this security has lost many of his rights. I mean that if he had under such circumstances paid the debt he could have gone upon his principal for it, or, if the principal was insolvent he could have gone upon his co-securities; but they are all insolvent, and he is the only one left out of whom the money can be made.

There is no plainer principle in law than this, which is applied in a similar case, where a party who is indebted to several others fails, or where a creditor has several securities responsible to him. There if the creditor releases any security that he may have against his principal, he thereby, pro tanto at least—and some of the books go much further—releases the security. The principle here I say is the same; the logic is the same. The Government by not bringing suit until twenty-odd years have elapsed has allowed time and the changes in the condition of the affairs of men to produce insolvency and death until a state of affairs has been brought about where there is nobody now living, principal or co-security, out of whom one dollar can be made except this man. This is the result of non-action on the part of the General Government. The precedent of granting relief in such a case is not a bad precedent; it is right and just; and this body ought never to hesitate in doing that which it thinks is right and just.

As was urged by the Senator from Arkansas, when Clarke went out of this office as a defaulter and the General Government appointed him to a much higher office, it thereby said to his securities that this man was worthy of credit by the General Government.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from West Virginia allow me to inquire whether it appears from the report that the defaulting officer was appointed to a higher position?

Mr. HEREFORD. No, sir; I did not conceive it necessary to incorporate that in the report.

Mr. McMILLAN. Please state the facts in regard to it.

Mr. HEREFORD. I believe the chairman of the committee will well recollect—I do; it is in the papers—a statement of one of the heads of the Departments, in the evidence on file in this case, that he was appointed subsequent to this defalcation to a higher office, in the Navy Department, I believe.

Mr. McMILLAN. At what time does that appear to have taken place?

Mr. HEREFORD. I forget the date; but it was subsequent to the defalcation. I did not conceive it necessary to incorporate that fact in the report; but that is one of the facts in the case.

I cannot see how this body can for one second hesitate to relieve this security from this responsibility. Here he is on the verge of the grave, and if he is compelled to pay this twelve hundred and odd dollars with the interest that has accrued thereupon it makes him a bankrupt.

I believe, Mr. President, the Senate will do in this case as it did in many similar cases last session—relieve the party from liability. Why, sir, suppose a case. Are we not to relieve a party simply because there is legal liability? Suppose the Treasurer of the United States to-day was robbed, and every dollar taken out of the vaults of the Treasury of the United States by highway robbery, in which there was no complicity on his part, and he was guilty of no laches, no negligence of any kind: what then? Under the law that United States Treasurer would be responsible for every dollar; but would not the Senate as a mere act of justice relieve that Treasurer? Certainly it would. The principle, the logic, and the philosophy are the same in that case as in this. I cannot believe that this great Government will seek to make this paltry sum out of this poor man after they have lain on their oars twenty-odd years and allowed the principal and all the securities except this one man to become insolvent.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, there are two of the securities of George W. Clarke, late Indian agent, living. One of these is Mr. Turner, of Arkansas, and the other James M. Brown, of Texas. The latter I know personally; the first I know professionally, and I know him to be a gentleman of high character. These gentlemen had a right to look to the property of the principal on that bond and the property of their co-securities as indemnification in the event that they were forced to pay. In 1858 the Government of the United States appointed Mr. Clarke a purser in the Navy, a bonded officer, accepted his bond, and he began to discharge the functions of that office under that bond. These securities had a perfect right to consider that the Government of the United States had looked to his situation as an Indian agent, that his accounts had been fairly settled, and that they stood discharged of their bond by reason of the Government appointing him to the second office and taking the second bond. The result, therefore, would be that naturally these securities would no longer look to the principal or their co-securities for indemnification; and thus the matter stood, if I remember the record which was made up here on the 25th of April, from 1856 until suit was instituted in 1875.

It does seem to me, therefore, that by the very act of the Government itself these securities were thrown off their guard and were not longer required to look to the property of the principal or their co-securities for indemnity. On page 2846 of the RECORD for last session is a letter from the Navy Department, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 10, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you, in reply to your letter of the 9th instant, that George W. Clarke, of Arkansas, was appointed a paymaster in the United States Navy June 2, 1856; August 20, 1858, he was ordered to the Supply; May 16, 1859, detached and settle accounts; January 9, 1860, to the Pawnee; February 10, August 21, 1860, detached and to the Powhatan; March 28, 1861, detached and settle accounts; April 3, 1861, ordered to Washington to settle accounts; June 1, 1861, dismissed from the naval service, from April 2, 1861.

Very respectfully, &c.,
R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. A. H. GARLAND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

That shows conclusively what I stated, that the Government did appoint this man Clarke to an important office—purser in the Navy—after he had been appointed Indian agent, after this bond had been executed by Turner, Brown, and others, and after he had exercised the duties of Indian agent and had retired from that position. The reasonable presumption would be, as the law required that all the accounts should be settled up before this new and important office was conferred on him, that that had been done; and if the Government, by its own laches, by its own negligence, by its oversight in looking into the condition of Clarke's accounts as Indian agent, did appoint him to the position of purser in the Navy, and let this matter rest for nineteen years, whereby the securities of Clarke were thrown entirely off their guard, equity, justice, fair dealing between man and man, and good morals demand that these securities, now in their old days, should not be required to come forward and pay that which has been brought upon them by reason of the action of the Government itself.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I did not listen to the report with that attention that I should have done; but it seems to me, as I understand it, this defalcation occurred nearly thirty years ago, and the Government allowed it to rest for more than twenty years without any interference by way of prosecution. Now, the statute wisely provides a limitation for private debts; and although this limitation does not apply by statute to public debts, the equity applies, and it seems to me that the other sureties who have died bankrupt should have been notified in time to have paid their proportion of the loss for which they were responsible, and not throw it all upon the surviving sureties. It seems to me that the claim is an equitable one as well as a merciful one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, this is as good a time as any, perhaps, to understand the principles upon which we are willing to proceed in cases of sureties upon Government bonds. If the law ought to be that the statute of limitations shall apply, then we ought to make the law so, in order that everybody may fare alike and that the United States shall not be put to the expense of prosecuting people after the time when the statute should otherwise have run when it comes to no end. But, although this subject has been under discussion very often and for a great number of years, nobody has proposed to change the statutes of limitation for the obvious reason that the Government of the United States, like the governments of the States, is obliged to rely upon officers and agents to do its business, and it has not the private and personal interest and the private and personal means of taking care of its own affairs that private citizens have.

The state of the case, then, is, that in order properly to relieve a surety the Government must have been guilty of some unjust conduct toward him. If it has been guilty of unjust conduct toward the surety, then plainly it ought to suffer the consequences of it, and not turn them over upon the surety. That is the only rule, I take it, upon which we could justly proceed.

Now, what has been the conduct of the Government and what has been the conduct of this gentleman? From his own petition the case appears to be just this: that he and others became the sureties of this man, Clarke, in 1854. Now he proceeds:

That some time in the year 1856 the said Clarke, while engaged in the performance of the duties of his agency, became involved in serious difficulties growing out of the troubles then existing in Kansas, and was either removed from office or compelled to resign.

That, so far, would naturally raise, as this is the very petitioner himself who is stating his case, the presumption in a fair mind, I take it, that this man was not behaving as he ought to have behaved in the office, and that this was known to his sureties who then, within two years from the time they signed his bond, were on the spot; and the person for whose benefit this bill is proposed states this himself; he is the petitioner, with one other co-surety:

Your memorialists are informed, and believe it to be true, that at the time said Clarke ceased to be said Indian agent he was a defaulter to the Government of the United States in a considerable sum of money, which defalcation was well known to the said Government, and no steps whatever taken to enforce the payment thereof.

This party seems to be studiously careful not to say that it was equally well known to the sureties, and in the papers which I have here there is no pretense of any evidence that it was not known to them. Neither this petitioner nor any of his associates appears to be willing to make an affidavit that they were ignorant of the fact that they were liable on this bond for a defalcation. It appeared, on the contrary, to have been a notorious transaction, known to them and to all the sureties, and, as these sureties now state, as they believe, to the Government of the United States. It ought to have been known to the proper Department, as a matter of course. It does not necessarily follow that it was known to the President of the United States when he appointed this man or nominated him to be a purser in the Navy two or three years afterward. That does not necessarily follow. You can scarcely say that the President of the United States is bound to know, when a person is presented to him for office who is not in office then, either that he has been a former Indian agent or a commissioner of deeds, or whatever it may be, or has held any other office that was not a very notorious one. Two years afterward, I think it is stated here, this person was appointed a purser in the Navy, and that at that time also they think the Government could have made the money, because it was understood that Clarke had in his possession a large amount of gold. The Government could not very well violate his personal rights by seizing the gold from his body for a debt. That would hardly do. If it was Government gold there would be another means of getting it; but if it was his own gold, so far as the bond went the Government could not seize it by the marshal, I suppose.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Vermont whether it appears from the papers in this case that the Government paid Clarke his salary as purser, and for how long, after the Government knew that he was in default by virtue of his other position?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know.

Mr. MITCHELL. If that were so, it was in direct violation of law, in violation of the statute of 1828 I believe it is, and it would, in my judgment, be a wrong, to say the least, on the part of the Government as againt these sureties.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That brings us right around to the question which I should be glad to have the Senate consider and adopt some definite rule upon, whether the Government in the sense in which we are now speaking of it as the responsible administration of the affairs of the United States, is chargeable with the neglect of its agents. That is the question. Now we will say that this man owed the Government $1,500 for moneys deposited with him as Indian agent. He was removed from office and was afterward appointed to a place in the Navy, and the Navy paymaster, he showing his commission and that his name appeared on the muster-roll of that particular ship as present for duty, pays him the salary that belongs to him for a month. Now, then, suppose that the Navy paymaster knew that Clarke was a debtor of the Government, would that relieve Mr. Clarke or his sureties on the bond upon which he was a debtor because this Navy pay agent had violated his duty in paying this money? My friend would not contend for that.

Mr. MITCHELL. I certainly would contend that in a court of law on a suit upon the bond against the sureties that fact would relieve the sureties at least to the extent of the amount so paid.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very good. Supposing that to be so, then there is no occasion for this bill if there is any such fact, because he has got a defense; but this gentleman does not seem to be advised by his counsel, wherever this suit is pending, that that would make a very good defense; and I respectfully submit to my friend, with great deference to his better judgment, that I am not able to agree with him about that kind of law. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided, and decided rightly, that the Government cannot be made responsible for the misconduct of the officers whom the law has provided for the administration of its affairs. That arose in a very celebrated case that grew out of the rebellion, where quartermasters or others drew great drafts that ought not to have been drawn and that got into the hands of innocent holders. But if the law is as my friend says it is about the holding back the salary, the naval paymaster had no right to pay it. I understand the Supreme Court to have decided, and I believe it to be the law whether they have decided it or not, that the fact that the naval paymaster did pay it does not change the relations of the United States toward this man's bond or his sureties at all, either in point of law or in point of equity, for the reason that there is a duty on the part of the sureties as well as upon the part of the officers of the Government. They have some duties to perform; they have undertaken some obligations; and they have no more right to complain of the delay of the United States in not suing a debt which they know or have the means of knowing that they owe to the Treasury of the United States, than the United States has to complain of them for not paying it until they are sued. There was nothing in the fact that the United States did not sue which prevented their going to the Treasury and depositing the money that they owed, as I have known sureties to do without suit before now when their principals had got into difficulty, although it is not a very common practice, I believe, with sureties; and I think that is what we lose sight of.

Of course this is a very small case, involving only about $1,200, which will not break the Treasury probably, particularly as we have silver now; but it is a thing we constantly lose sight of that while there is a duty on the part of some officers of the United States whom the law has appointed, as the Solicitor of the Treasury to prosecute bonds, there is a corresponding duty on the part of the sureties who sign the bonds to pay when a default occurs. There is that duty on their part because the accounts are always open to them to see, when their principal goes out of office, that his accounts are settled and their obligation discharged. There is no pretense in this instance in the petition of this gentleman and his associates, not even a hint, that the circumstance of this debt's existing was not just as well known to them as it was to the Solicitor of the Treasury or whatever officer had charge of that bond. If they had shown to us in this instance that they were really and actually ignorant, and had no ground of suspicion that this man went out of office with a balance in his hands due to the United States, and that these circumstances had intervened, it would make a different case; but they do not say so. I assume, therefore, that the truth is not so, because they speak upon the subject; they speak of the notorious circumstances under which he disappeared from this office and became a private citizen; and the only point they make in the petition is the fact that the United States did not sue them when it might have sued them all, and got the money out of them all, instead of a part.

Now, then, if I have stated the principle correctly, and I think I have, if from the papers the principle applies to this state of the case that the sureties are in equity entitled to relief, the Senate ought to be ready to follow the same rule in every other case of the kind. Then it comes right down to this statement, that in case of a default on an official bond known both to the sureties and to the accounting officers of the Government, if the Government neglects to sue the sureties until some change in their relation between themselves makes it inconvenient for one of them to pay it all, the Government has lost its right in justice and in equity. You cannot carry on a government that way, Mr. President, even under a republican administration, although this appears to have taken place under a democratic one.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] has overlooked some of the papers on the files. He assumes that the sureties were aware of the defalcation of the principal. Now, there is not any evidence that they ever did know it, and all the facts in the case show that they did not know it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why, then, did they not make an affidavit that they did not know?

Mr. TELLER. I suppose they did not make the affidavit because the case was prepared at a long distance from here, and perhaps the parties did not understand that they would be called upon to meet that view of the case. The record shows that this man went out of office in December, 1856. The record also shows that in 1858 he was appointed to another office, which was a declaration on the part of the Government at least to the sureties that he was not indebted to the Government, because the appointment was a violation of law if he was so indebted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where is the law for that?

Mr. TELLER. The act of 1828.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to see that statute.

Mr. TELLER. I ought perhaps to change my statement. The law to which I refer does not say he shall not be appointed, but it makes it the duty of the Government, as I understand, not to pay him any money under an office when he is indebted to the Government, which amounts to the same thing practically. The Government did then proceed to appoint him to a lucrative office, required bonds of him, and paid him his salary undoubtedly, for there is no evidence that they did not. From the Department of Justice we find they did not know in that office that he was ever a defaulter until March, 1860. I have here the letter from the Solicitor's office, in which he says:

> The agent was found to be in default and relieved from duty on the 31st of December, 1856—

Not default financially, but default I suppose in some other particular, because he adds:

> His accounts were examined in the office of the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, and on the 14th March, 1860, he was found to be indebted to the United States in the sum of $1,245.77.

So I think it may be inferred that the sureties had no knowledge of this defalcation, although I will admit that it perhaps was their duty to have come down to Washington and seen whether the man whose bond they had signed had paid up as the provisions of the bond required; yet that is such an unusual thing, such an unheard of thing, that I suppose it will hardly be exacted of these men. It seems to me that if the Government will lay by for twenty-one years lacking a few months after the defalcation is or ought to be brought home to the knowledge of the Government, when the circumstances of all these men have changed, an equitable case at least is presented. I suppose if these men had a legal defense they would not be here with this application.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President, I have no particular interest in having this claim rejected by the Senate. The only reason why objection is made by me is that it involves a principle which will be continually presented to the Committee on Claims and to the Senate for disposition. If in this case the claim is allowed, it must follow, it seems to me, that in any other case of the default of a principal on an official bond the sureties may ask to be relieved from their liability. So far as I recollect the facts of the case as they were presented to the committee at the last session—I have not had an opportunity of examining the papers at this session—the impression was left upon my mind that the sureties in this case were advised of the defalcation on the part of their principal as an Indian agent, and that he was removed from his office on account of the defalcation, as stated in the report of the committee, on the 31st day of December, 1856.

Now, if these sureties were aware that their principal had made default to the Government of the United States, it was their duty to come forward and pay that indebtedness. They could have protected themselves in that way. If their principal was abundantly able to pay the default, they could have secured themselves and secured the Government at the same time. In addition to that it is well known that during a large portion of the time that intervened between the date of this default and the period when the General Government undertook to collect this bond, the country was not in a condition when the bond could have been enforced. The State of Arkansas was out of the Union practically, and the Government could not enforce her rights against these sureties, and the circumstances of the times both before and since the commencement and termination of the war have been such as to excuse the Government for inattention to a matter of this kind which occurred in 1856. As soon as the Government could give her attention to these matters, it has been done, and she is prosecuting this bond; and the fact that some of the sureties are dead and the estates insolvent is no ground of equity here against the Government of the United States.

If a statute of limitations is to be passed to be applied to the Government of the United States, that should be done upon due consideration, and the principle should be applied under a general law. There are no facts here that will make this case an exception to any of the cases where defaults have occurred and any considerable time has elapsed since the fact was known to the Government.

There is no hardship, certainly, in these parties being called upon to pay an indebtedness which they knew (because that fact does appear indirectly all through the papers) existed at the time this default occurred. If we pass this bill, we may as well conclude that no official bond can be enforced against sureties hereafter, because the claim will present itself with equal force.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

On the question of ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, a division was called for, and the ayes were 30, the noes 5—not a quorum voting.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We may as well take the yeas and nays on this question, and the call will produce a quorum.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 43, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—43.

Allison,	Conover,	Ingalls,	Oglesby,
Anthony,	Dawes,	Johnston,	Patterson,
Bailey,	Dorsey,	Jones of Florida,	Plumb,
Bayard,	Eaton,	Kellogg,	Randolph,
Beck,	Eustis,	Lamar,	Ransom,
Booth,	Garland,	McCreery,	Rollins,
Burnside,	Gordon,	McDonald,	Saulsbury,
Butler,	Grover,	Maxey,	Teller,
Christiancy,	Harris,	Merrimon,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Hereford,	Mitchell,	Withers.
Coke,	Hill,	Morgan,

NAYS—7.

Cameron of Wis.,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Windom.
Edmunds,	Howe,	Morrill,

ABSENT—26.

Armstrong,	Davis of Illinois,	Kirkwood,	Spencer,
Barnum,	Davis of West Va.,	McPherson,	Thurman,

Cameron of Pa.,	Hoar,	Sargent,	Whyte.
Chaffee,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,
Conkling,	Kernan,	Sharon,

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at one o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 5, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SINGLETON, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5312) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SINGLETON. I give notice that I shall call up this bill on Tuesday next, immediately after the morning hour.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLYMER, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5313) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLYMER. I give notice that I shall call up this bill for consideration immediately after the diplomatic appropriation bill is disposed of.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to reserve all points of order on both the appropriation bills just reported.

FRANCIS M. JOHNSON.

Mr. SHELLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the reference of the bill (H. R. No. 4820) for the relief of Francis M. Johnston be changed from the Committee on Public Lands to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SERVICE.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, presented correspondence of the Department of State in relation to the diplomatic and consular service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN.

Mr. LUTTRELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5314) granting a pension to Benjamin Franklin; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JUDICIAL RECORDS WESTERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have passed at once a bill to provide for supplying the records of the district and circuit courts of the United States for the western district of Texas, which were lately destroyed by fire.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to restore the records and files in the district and circuit courts of the United States for the western district of Texas, lately destroyed by fire.

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be the duty of the district attorney for the western district of Texas to take such steps as may be necessary to restore the records and files of the circuit and district courts of said district which were destroyed by fire on the night of the 16th of November, 1878, and in which the United States is interested, so far as the judges of said courts respectively shall deem it essential to the interests of the United States that said records and files be restored; and the judges of said courts, respectively, are authorized to direct such steps to be taken as in their opinion shall be deemed advisable to restore the judgment dockets and indices of said courts, and for that purpose may direct the performance, by the clerks of said courts, and by the United States attorney for said district, of any duty incident thereto; and said clerks and said district attorney shall be allowed such compensation and disbursements for services rendered under this act (in cases where no compensation is provided by law for such services) as may be allowed by the Attorney-General and certified to be just and reasonable by the judge of the court in which said services are rendered, and the amount so allowed shall be paid out of the judiciary fund: Provided, however, That the sum allowed the clerks of said courts shall not exceed the sum of $8,000, and the entire compensation of the United States district attorney for such services shall not exceed the sum of $4,000.

Mr. EDEN. Is this bill presented for reference merely?

The SPEAKER. It is offered for immediate action.

Mr. REAGAN. I will state that the bill is an exact copy (except as to the names) of the act of 1872, authorizing the supplying of the records of the United States court which were burned at Chicago. The only change we have made is to reduce by 50 per cent. the amount appropriated in that case. I desire to have read letters from the Attorney-General of the United States, and from the judge of that district.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection these letters will be read, after which the Chair will recognize the right of any gentleman to object.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, December 2, 1878.

SIR: You will please find inclosed herewith the two letters received by you from Judge Thomas H. Duval, of the western district of Texas, in which is given an account of the late fire in Tyler, Texas, which destroyed the records of the courts of the United States held in that place. I have considered your oral proposition that Congress should at an early day make provision for the restoration of the records in this case similar to the one made in the case of the Chicago fire in 1871, and agree with you that suitable legislation should be obtained if possible to effect the object above expressed.

Very respectfully,

CHARLES DEVENS,
Attorney-General.

Hon. JOHN H. REAGAN,
House of Representatives.

TYLER, November 21, 1878.

MY DEAR JUDGE: On Saturday night last, about one o'clock, the building occupied here by the United States circuit and district courts was consumed by fire, together with all the records and papers. With the exception of the judges' docket of civil cases in the circuit court, and a docket, kept by the clerk for his own convenience, of the criminal cases pending before the district court, everything was lost. Never was destruction of a court's records more total and complete. The fire commenced in the basement of a house adjoining the court-house on the east side, and I suppose had burned for some time under the court building before it was discovered. When the flames burst out above it was impossible, owing to the heat and smoke, to save anything of consequence, except out of the marshal's office. In less than an hour the records and papers, accumulating for the last twenty-five years, were swept away.

On looking at page 169 of the United States Revised Statutes you will find three sections of a general law providing for the restoration of destroyed records, &c. But they are rather meager, and wanting in details. Immediately following these sections are two or three others, passed in 1872, to meet the exigencies of a fire by which the records of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the northern district of Illinois were consumed on the 9th October, 1871.

To remedy, as far as possible, the great loss, public and private, resulting from the fire here, I would respectfully suggest that you prepare and introduce in Congress as soon as it meets a bill containing provisions similar to those in reference to the fire, and such other provisions, if any, as you may conceive to be proper and necessary to meet the requirements of the case. The United States district attorney and clerk can render most important aid in restoring records here, and they should be paid for this extra labor, as they were in Illinois. Of course the amount of their compensation should be fixed at what might be deemed reasonable and just, considering the great interests involved and the urgency of the case. I suppose there will be no difficulty in getting Congress to pass such a bill as I have suggested. What was done for a court in Illinois ought to be done for one in Texas under like circumstances. If such an act is promptly passed much of the loss growing out of the fire here may be remedied before the next meeting of the court on the fourth Monday of April.

Our capable and worthy clerk, W. C. Robards, has sustained a great loss by this fire in many respects, especially by the destruction of his ledger and fee-books. They were consumed, with everything else in his iron safe. All the records and papers in the bankrupt court were destroyed, among others.

As the Tyler branch of the Federal court is in your district, and I know you will feel an interest in the subject, I address you this letter. I shall reopen the courts here day after to-morrow, to do what little I can in the way of repairing damages by making such orders as may seem to be within my power under existing circumstances.

I will be glad to hear from you in reference to the subject of this letter. Write to me at Austin.

Very truly your friend and obedient servant,

T. H. DUVAL.

Hon. JOHN H. REAGAN.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 5315) was received, read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REAGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHAPLAINS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. JONES, of New Hampshire, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5316) regulating the appointment and relative rank of chaplains in the Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BRENTANO. I rise to a personal explanation. I send to the desk a copy of the Washington Post, of July 24, 1878, and ask the Clerk to read the article which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

THOSE SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS—WHO ARE THE PRINCIPAL DEBTORS—HOW THE 3.65 CLAUSE WAS PASSED.—The bill for the payment of assessments for special improvements in the District, which passed Congress at its last session, is again attracting some attention, from a statement made a few days since that Mr. Hayes had referred the subject to the Attorney-General and that there was a strong probability that the operations of the law would be suspended until Congress again assembled. Of course Mr. Hayes has no such power, and the rumor undoubtedly arose from the fact that just after the passage of the bill by both Houses several vigorous protests were presented to Mr. Hayes, requesting him to veto it. Delegations of wealthy property-owners interested in its defeat also called at the White House. The Executive referred the matter to his Attorney-General, who declared the measure a legal one, and it was signed and became a law. By its provisions the commissioners are charged with its execution, and arrangements have already been made by them to enforce it. Congress also gave the property-holders a chance to reduce these assessments by an entire revision of the charges made, and thousands have availed themselves of the opportunity offered and filed their claims. The amount outstanding for special assessments will foot up to upward of $1,300,000, due principally by the wealthy property-owners, Mr. Corcoran heading the list with about $25,000. The Linthicum estate, in the county, opposite the Georgetown line, controlled by Mr. Josiah Dent, one of the commissioners, is next upon the list, followed by the names of Columbus Alexander, Kilbourn & Latta, Horace S. Johnson, and Henry S. Davis. About one-fifth of the above-named amount is represented in suits now pending in the courts against the legality of the original assessments. Mr. Corcoran has persistently refused to pay any of these assessments, but departed from his firm determination a few days since in the sale of the lots on B street, northwest, between Fourteenth and Fifteenth, to the Government for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. The Government agents found a lien of $2,000 on these lots for special improvements and so informed Mr. Corcoran. He offered to give bonds for the payment until the matter was settled in the courts, but the Government required an absolutely free title, and he was compelled to settle this much in order to consummate the sale. The First National Bank of New York holds special improvement liens to upward of a quarter of a million dollars, and it is now pretty strongly rumored, since the smoke and dust of the contest has passed, that the 3.65 bond ring, of which this bank is the acknowledged head, spent a quarter of a million dollars in securing the passage of the following clause in the permanent form of government bill, namely: "Hereafter the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the interest on the 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia, issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, when the same shall become due and payable; and all amounts so paid shall be credited as a part of the appropriation for the year by the United States toward the expenses of the District of Columbia, as hereinbefore provided." Thirteen million seven hundred and forty-three thousand two hundred and fifty dollars of these bonds are outstanding, the First National Bank of New York being the principal holders. A short time before the passage of the bill they were quoted at 76, and the day after at 85; thus upward of a million dollars was made on the "raise." There are some ugly rumors afloat as to the manner in which the corruption fund to secure the passage of the bill was disposed of, and who received it. An indignant property-owner avers that a Vermont Representative got away with $25,000, and a Chicago member and a Maryland member with $12,250 apiece, and that the balance of the fund went to the Senate committee.

Mr. BRENTANO. There are three Representatives from the city of Chicago in this House. One of those three who sits on this side of the House [Mr. ALDRICH] voted against the bill. My friend on the other side of the House from the city of Chicago [Mr. HARRISON] did not vote on the bill at all. I am the only member from Chicago who voted for the bill, and am at the same time a member of the Committee for the District of Columbia, which committee prepared the bill. Now, Mr. Speaker, I cannot afford to have this spot on my character, and therefore I move the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Washington Post, a daily newspaper published in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, did, in its issue of July 24, 1878, contain in its editorial columns an article headed "Those special assessments—Who are the principal debtors—How the 3.65 clause was passed," and which article, charging corruption against members of Congress in reference to the bill providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia, concludes as follows:

"There are some ugly rumors afloat as to the manner in which the corruption fund to secure the passage of the bill was disposed of, and who received it. An indignant property-owner avers that a Vermont Representative got away with $25,000, and a Chicago member and a Maryland member with $12,250 apiece, and that the balance of the fund went to the Senate committee;" and

Whereas the facts alleged in said article and the averment of "an indignant property-owner" published in said article constitute the charge of the crime of accepting a bribe by members of Congress, the punishment for which is provided for in section 5500 of the Revised Statutes; and

Whereas the substance of said article and the charges contained therein have been telegraphed by special dispatches and by the Associated Press all over the country and otherwise copied and spread out by many newspapers: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service be, and it is hereby, directed to inquire into the said charges against certain members of this House, and to report at any time to this House whether any member, especially any member from Vermont, Chicago, or Maryland, is guilty of any act as charged in said article of the Washington Post; and the committee is authorized to send for persons and papers.

Mr. HENKLE. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will pass the resolution presented by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRENTANO] without a dissenting voice. I do not entertain a sanguine hope that a committee of investigation by this House or any other investigation will bring to light the scoundrels who have given origin to this scandal. This is the only means left, however, by and through which members may vindicate themselves from the slanderous aspersions of those who seem to make it their special vocation to malign the character of gentlemen whose course has not chimed with their own interests. Soon after the appearance of this article in the Washington Post I addressed a letter to the editor of that paper demanding of him the name of the author of the article, and to be informed who the "indignant property-owner" was who averred that corrupt influences had been used to secure the passage of the bill in question and that so much of the corruption fund had gone to different parties. The answer was unsatisfactory and evasive. I wrote another letter, demanding in more peremptory terms to know who was the author of the letter. That letter was not answered at all.

Now, if the character of members of this House is to be continually subjected to malicious slanders of this sort, without any sort of justification, it is time that Congress took some steps by which the members of this body should be protected. I hope, therefore, that this resolution will pass without a dissenting voice and that no effort will be spared by that committee to probe this subject to the bottom. If there is corruption, reveal it; turn the sunlight upon this whole subject; and if it is a malicious slander, let the perpetrators of the slander be brought to the bar of public justice.

Mr. FRYE. As a warm personal friend of the gentleman from Vermont, who is a member of the District Committee, [Mr. HENDEE,] and as one having implicit confidence in that gentleman's integrity, I desire simply to call attention to the fact that Mr. HENDEE is absent now from the House at his rooms with a sick family.

The question being taken on agreeing to the preamble and resolution, they were unanimously adopted.

UNIT OF VALUE.

Mr. SCALES, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5317) fixing the value of the trade and Mexican dollars and providing that the legal-tender silver dollar shall be the unit of value; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

BRANDY MADE OF APPLES, ETC.

Mr. SCALES also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5318) to abolish all taxes on brandy made of apples, peaches, or grapes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

OMAHA RAILROAD BRIDGE.

Mr. FINLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5319) limiting rates for the transportation of freight and passengers over the bridge constructed by the Union Pacific Railroad Company across the Missouri River at Omaha, Nebraska; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES P. ALCON.

Mr. FINLEY also, by unanimous consent, introduced a resolution instructing the Committee of Accounts to allow and pay to James P. Alcon what may be due him for services as messenger; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Accounts.

TREATY BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND OSAGE INDIANS.

Mr. CALKINS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5320) to carry into effect the second and sixteenth articles of the treaty between the United States and the Great and Little Osage Indians, proclaimed January 21, 1867; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LEVI ARNOLD.

Mr. WRIGHT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5321) granting a pension to Levi Arnold; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PROFESSOR HAYDEN'S SURVEY.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred, under the law, to the Joint Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That there be printed 10,000 copies of Professor Hayden's twelfth annual report of the Geological and Geographical Survey of the Territories for 1878; 5,000 of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the Department of the Interior, and 1,000 copies for the use of the office of the survey.

SURVEY OF THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado, also, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, and referred, under the law, to the Joint Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 3,000 copies each of volumes 3, 8, and 13 of the final reports of Geological and Geographical Survey of the Territories, in quarto form, with the necessary illustrations; 1,500 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 500 for the use of the Senate, 500 for the use of the survey, and 500 for the use of the Department of the Interior, the illustrations to be made by the Public Printer, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

JULIUS BAUMER.

Mr. COX, of New York, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the following resolution introduced by Mr. BRENTANO:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, all the papers and correspondence between this Government and the government of the German Empire in reference to the expulsion from the whole territory of the German Empire of Julius Baumer, a naturalized citizen of the United States and a resident of the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, while on a visit to his aged parents at Münster, Westphalia, in the kingdom of Prussia, by the Prussian government, in violation of the treaty of May 1, 1828.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask for action upon the resolution at this time.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. COX, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ROBERT H. FIELD.

Mr. KENNA, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5322) for the relief of Robert H. Field, of Kanawha County, West Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

RANK OF WARRANT OFFICERS.

Mr. MORSE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5323) giving assimilated rank to warrant officers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE C. BUCKNAM.

Mr. MORSE also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5324) granting an increase of pension to George C. Bucknam; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

Mr. HARRISON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate to the House the names of all the employés at the custom-house in the city of Chicago, with their salary, and the nature of their duties, since the appointment of the present collector at that post.

Mr. HARRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUITS IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5325) to enable certain persons to sue in United States courts without payment of, or security for, costs; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. EAMES, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House all petitions and papers heretofore presented relating to the establishment of a signal station at Block Island, in the State of Rhode Island, and the same were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. EAMES also presented the following petition of citizens of Rhode Island and other States, for the establishment of a signal station on Block Island to be connected with the mainland by a telegraph cable:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, who have visited Block Island, recognize the importance and advantage to the maratime commerce of the United States of the establishment at that point of a signal station to be connected with the mainland by a telegraph cable.

Block Island is situated at the entrance of Long Island Sound, through which all vessels plying between New York and eastern ports pass. It is also on the direct line of maritime intercourse with Europe and all the Atlantic coast ports, and from the south light on the island the courses are taken by all European and coasting steamers and vessels.

The usefulness of the Signal Service is so well recognized that to establish the importance of a station at this point we need but mention the fact that there is no place on our whole Atlantic coast more exposed or where the signal of foul or fair weather would be greeted by so many vessels, since in a clear atmosphere an average of two hundred sails may be seen from the south light-house daily.

Telegraphic communication with the mainland would also add much to the service of the life-saving stations already established here in announcing wrecks, which are of frequent occurrence on this coast, and in obtaining relief to distress signals they are now unable to answer.

The cost of such a station and cable would be but little compared with their great importance to the commerce of the country, and as Block Island is rapidly becoming a most favored summer resort a large revenue would be received at the cable office from commercial and miscellaneous business.

The necessity of this signal station and cable has been recognized and earnestly recommended by Government officers and attachés of the service, among whom may be mentioned the late president of the Light-House Board, the much lamented Professor Joseph Henry.

For these and further reasons that shall be apparent, we earnestly and respectfully urge upon your honorable bodies that such station and cable shall be established at this point.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ORANGE E. BOWERS.

Mr. LATHROP, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5326) granting a pension to Orange E. Bowers, late private Company H, Fifteenth Regiment Illinois Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SAREPTA M. I. HENRY.

Mr. LATHROP also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5327) granting a pension to Sarepta M. I. Henry, widow of James W. Henry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES BRUIEN.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5328) granting a pension to James Bruien, late sergeant Company H, Forty-fifth United States Colored Troops; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL G. BLISS.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5329) granting a pension to Samuel G. Bliss, late private Company A, Forty-third Ohio Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS LOWRY.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5330) granting a pension to Thomas Lowry, late sergeant Company A, One hundred forty-seventh Pennsylvania Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

HANNAH DIMOND.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5331) granting a pension to Hannah Dimond, mother of Thomas Dimond, late private Company C, Sixty-third Pennsylvania Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE W. MORSE.

Mr. POLLARD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5332) for the relief of George W. Morse; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, asked and obtained leave to submit the views of the minority of the committee upon the same subject, and that they be printed.

JOHN M'INTOSH KELL.

Mr. CANDLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5333) for the removal of the political disabilities of John McIntosh Kell, of Georgia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

DEPRESSION OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask consent at this time to report to the House the testimony taken by the special committee in regard to the depression of business. I move that the testimony be recommitted to that committee, and that the committee be authorized to have printed such portion of the testimony already taken and of such testimony as may hereafter be taken as to the committee may seem desirable.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

H. R. RATHBONE.

Mr. BUNDY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5334) for the relief of H. R. Rathbone, late major Fifth United States Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AARON SHERIDAN.

Mr. HAYES, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5335) granting a pension to the minor children of Aaron Sheridan, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MATTHEW M'DONNELL.

Mr. HAYES also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5336) for the relief of Matthew McDonnell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

HENRY MAPES.

Mr. HAYES also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5337) for the relief of Henry Mapes, late of Company C, Eighty-eighth Illinois Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MESSENGER FOR WAR CLAIMS COMMITTEE.

Mr. EDEN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Accounts:

Resolved, That the Committee on War Claims be authorized to appoint a messenger during the present session of Congress at the same rate of compensation as a laborer.

TIMBER DEPREDATIONS.

Mr. ACKLEN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the House of Representatives with an account of all moneys expended by the Department of Justice in prosecutions for timber depredations in the State of Louisiana, and that he furnish the House with the number of suits instituted, number dismissed, number successfully prosecuted, and number of cases still pending, and with the accounts of the marshal of the southern district of Louisiana in each and every of said suits, and that he give a detailed statement of accounts presented by said marshal to his Department, whether the same have been paid and allowed or not; and that he also furnish to this House a statement of all contracts and with amounts paid or agreed to be paid to any and all attorneys employed in aid of the regular attorney of the Government.

MORTON C. FISHER.

Mr. TUCKER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 4962) for the relief of Morton C. Fisher.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill remits the duties levied upon two steam-plows imported by Morton C. Fisher into the port of San Francisco for his own use.

Mr. EDEN. I wish the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] would get a bill through to allow a good many things to come in free of duty. I do not know why these plows should come in free rather than many other things.

Mr. TUCKER. They were imported by Mr. Fisher for his own use, and it has been usual always to remit duties in such cases.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that this bill is unanimously reported favorably from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. TUCKER. That is correct.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TUCKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 1367) to aid in the protection of the public buildings and property against loss and damage by fire;

A bill (S. No. 824) establishing the rank of the senior inspector-general; and

A bill (S. No. 1133) for the relief of William Gibson.

WEST POINT COMMERCIAL COMPANY OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. TUCKER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5338) to authorize the West Point Commercial Company of Virginia to do business in foreign countries; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF PENSION LAWS.

Mr. McMAHON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5339) to amend the pension laws; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SIMON C. CHAMBERLIN.

Mr. OLIVER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5340) for the relief of Simon C. Chamberlin, of Susanville, Lassen County, California; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM R. ROGERS.

Mr. HENDERSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5341) granting a pension to William R. Rogers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

NATHANIEL JOHNSON COFFIN.

Mr. JONES, of New Hampshire, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5342) granting a pension to Nathaniel Johnson Coffin; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SUCCESSOR TO HENRY DOUGLAS.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, since the adjournment of Congress last June, a man named Douglas, for many years an employé of this House, has died. As his name is mentioned in the appropriation bill in connection with the position he held, it is believed by the Doorkeeper that a successor cannot be appointed without special authority from the House, as the salary of the office was appropriated to Mr. Douglas by name. I therefore move that the Doorkeeper be authorized to appoint a man in place of Douglas at the same salary for the balance of this fiscal year.

The SPEAKER. To be paid out of the contingent fund.

Mr. GARFIELD. The payment ought to be made out of the contingent fund.

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. The name of Mr. Douglas was specified in the appropriation bill because he had been in the service of the House for a long time; but it is manifestly right that somebody should fill his place.

The SPEAKER. Provision for the payment of the successor might be made ultimately in the deficiency bill, but for immediate payment the money must come out of the contingent fund.

The motion of Mr. ATKINS was agreed to.

POST-ROADS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, recommending the establishing of certain post-roads; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

ACCOUNTS OF TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Treasurer of the United States, transmitting a copy of the Treasurer's account rendered to and adjusted by the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Treasurer of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with section 311 of the Revised Statutes, "fair" and "accurate" copies of the accounts "rendered" to and "settled with the First Comptroller;" which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the commissioners of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, relative to the sale of certain real estate belonging to that institution; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

INDIAN DEPREDATIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting additional papers in the Indian depredation claim of L. A. Thrasher and Mrs. C. C. Short, transmitted to Congress January 20, 1875; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

G. W. CRAWFORD.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the application of G. W. Crawford, of Alabama, for appointment as second lieutenant; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PROTESTS AND APPEALS IN CUSTOMS-DUTIES CASES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending a change in the law relating to the protests and appeals from assessments of duties in customs cases; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

INCREASE OF FORCE IN PATENT OFFICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Patents relative to an appropriation for additional assistant examiners, clerks, and laborers in his office; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

FORT CUMMINGS MILITARY RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, recommending that the United States retain possession of the Fort Cummings military reservation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CAPTAIN BATES AND LIEUTENANT YECKLEY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, recommending the passage of a bill for the relief of Captain Bates and Lieutenant Yeckley; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIM IN NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico on private land claim No. 76; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

SUSPENDED LAND ENTRIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office on the adjudication of suspended land entries during the year ended June 30, 1878; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

LAWS OF WYOMING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the secretary of the Territory of Wyoming, transmitting a copy of the session laws of Wyoming passed by the fifth Legislative Assembly; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONTESTED ELECTION, HARALSON VS. SHELLEY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House testimony in the contested-election case of Jere Haralson against C. M. Shelley, fourth congressional district of Alabama, in behalf of the contestant; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

ELIAS AND EUNICE O. BREWER.

Mr. BREWER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5343) for the relief of Elias and Eunice O. Brewer, of Ingham County, Michigan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

YELLOW-FEVER EPIDEMIC.

Mr. WOOD. As there seems to be no pressing business before the House, I desire to call its attention to a concurrent resolution adopted by the Senate on yesterday to provide for an investigation as to the late yellow-fever epidemic. As the House has decided to adjourn over until Monday, I desire to suggest that some arrangement of a like character to that which the Senate has made be made by the House before its adjournment to-day. The Senate has appointed a committee of seven members to act in conjunction substantially with a like committee of this House; and as time is very important, that a report may be made during the present session of Congress, I desire to call the attention of the House to the necessity of adopting some resolution on this question before its adjournment to-day. I would like to ask the Speaker whether the Committee on Rules, to which this subject was referred, is now ready to report?

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Rules, the Chair understands, have delayed reporting in consequence of the indisposition of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] a member of the Committee on Rules. The Chair understands, however, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is now authorized to report from that committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Rules to report the concurrent resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That a commission is hereby authorized and constituted, to consist of four (4) Senators, to be appointed by the Senate; five (5) members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker; and experts not exceeding seven (7) in number, to be selected by and associated with them, with authority to determine the time and place of meeting, to employ stenographers and clerks, to take testimony, and by subcommittees to visit the recently infected localities and other places, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the recent history and the means of prevention and arrest of yellow fever and other epidemic diseases, and to report the facts and their opinions and recommendations by bill or otherwise, at any time.

Mr. GARFIELD. If there be any gentlemen who desire to say anything on the resolution I will yield to them.

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to say a word or two.

Mr. WOOD. Before the gentleman from Mississippi says anything I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether the Committee on Rules, at the time of the adoption of this report presented by him, were in possession of the action of the Senate, as the report made by the Committee on Rules appears to differ very much from the action of the Senate.

Mr. GARFIELD. The action of the Senate had not come to hand when the Committee on Rules met. Several resolutions were sent by the House to the committee, four or five I think, introduced by different gentlemen, and the committee selected what they thought the most comprehensive; in fact this resolution combines pretty much everything that was suggested in the several resolutions before the committee. Of course if anything has been learned or any new light has been thrown on the subject by the Senate resolution this is the time to embody the better view in the one I have reported.

On the general subject I wish to say a single word before the gentleman from Mississippi proceeds. The Committee on Rules did not go into the discussion of what power the Congress may possess in this matter. It was enough for them to know that even under the strictest construction of the Constitution we have an undoubted right to make quarantine regulations of the high seas around our harbors and along our navigable rivers, and that we had the further clear and unquestioned right to take care of the health of our own Army and Navy and of the officers in the custom-houses and other public offices located at the various ports. Beyond that we did not think it necessary to raise any question, proposing to let the commission examine that subject should any doubt arise as to the power of the Government on this subject. Our chief concern was to provide for exploring the facts connected with the appalling pestilence which has ravaged so large a portion of the Union.

On that question I am glad to say that not only we who occupy these seats but Americans everywhere are as absolutely one as men can be on this earth. The invisible power which carried sudden death to so many households also touched a depth in the American heart which party passion has invaded; and out of that depth have come the purest and noblest sympathies of which human nature is capable. Guided by those impulses, let us seek to give a wise direction to any efforts which the future may require.

I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] whatever time he may wish to occupy.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I am gratified, for one, that the Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the several propositions submitted a day or two ago, have been unanimous in their action. I was about to suggest what has been referred to by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] that the action of the Senate, which indicates that it is the opinion of that body that a commission of seven Senators, to act in concert with a similar committee of this House, be appointed and report to the respective bodies such legislation as may be necessary to effect the purpose had in view. I am glad to hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] express what I am sure will find a response in every heart in every portion of our common country, that this affliction, which has visited us with a virulence hitherto unknown to this disease, has evoked a feeling which makes all mankind "akin to one another." It breaks down all barriers of party; it prostrates all considerations of section, and makes us in deed and in truth feel that we are one people, of one origin, one blood and lineage.

I feel gratified, sir, that the committee have acted with so much unanimity, and I have nothing to say against the report except that I would suggest, as has been done by my friend, [Mr. WOOD,] as we are now in possession of the action of the Senate we had better make the resolution of the House conform to the action of that body in this, that we will appoint a committee—whether or not it shall embrace experts outside I am not clear on that question—but I think that a commission should be created by the two Houses which will suggest some practical legislation on this subject so that it may not be said, as was said in the message of the President, that the act of April 29, 1878, passed too late to go into practical effect. I am satisfied that no member of the profession which has devoted itself with so much zeal and fidelity to the relief of the afflicted everywhere will not promptly respond to the appeal of the commission and give whatever information they may possess upon that subject to it. Experience has demonstrated during the last terrible affliction which visited such a large region of our country that rigid quarantine regulations may be implicitly relied on. It is a remarkable fact that the epidemic never found lodgment on the Atlantic coast, though this was the first section of our country to suffer in former epidemics.

It was my fortune to be in Mobile on the very day on which the quarantine was enforced, and I thought at the time, as many thought, that it was a hardship both upon the traveler and upon the commercial interests of the country. We all lived to see that the city of Mobile had acted with a foresight which saved her in a large degree from being one of the cities visited by this great scourge.

It did not prevail at Natchez, so intimately connected with New Orleans, situated on the Mississippi River, four hundred miles from this great commercial center. Natchez, at a very early day, established her quarantine, and the result was that while the fell scourge approached within eight miles of it on the south and seven miles on the north, not a solitary case up to this good hour has appeared in Natchez, one of the largest cities, commercially and in population, in the State of Mississippi, and which had always suffered when the fever prevailed in New Orleans. These two instances alone demonstrate the necessity of a quarantine being kept up by our Navy, which would find a useful occupation in the protection of the health of the people. I say that these two instances demonstrate that what one city has accomplished the whole Union may accomplish by adopting an extended coast quarantine. And, sir, the experience of the past summer—the fatal experience of the past summer—shows the security which may result from stringent quarantine regulations in regard to this terrible disease.

This disease will go everywhere where the condition of the atmosphere and temperature will carry it. It went up into the State of the gentleman from Ohio to Gallipolis; it went where it had never been known before, into the States of Kentucky and Tennessee. I am glad to say that when our afflicted people sought refuge in healthier regions, somewhat to the peril of the inhabitants thereof, especially in Louisville, Kentucky, her generous people threw open wide her doors to the fugitives from my section.

I think that experience has demonstrated that it is a fever of foreign origin, and that vessels or goods from foreign ports bring it into this country, and therefore that it may be excluded by a rigid quarantine, which in its character will substantially protect us from the incursions of this disease from New York to Galveston.

We are aware of the fact that in former years it visited even the city of New York; and if it shall appear again with a virulence as great as that of last summer, we know not what regions of our country may be visited and devastated by it.

It may be urged that this would be an interference with commerce. Sir, there is a higher consideration than the mere protection of the commerce of our own country, or that of others under treaty stipulations and regulations. That consideration is the preservation of the public health of the country by all the means that the Government possesses and can carry into effect.

I give my most hearty assent to the report of the Committee on Rules, and I trust it will be adopted with the same unanimity here that characterized the adoption of a similar resolution in the other branch of Congress.

One word more, Mr. Speaker, and I will be done, and it is this: in this terrible affliction, when the hand of this fell destroyer was laid upon our people everywhere, it was scarcely known when throughout this broad land, from Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, from even the smallest towns and hamlets all through the northern and western portions of our country, they came to our relief with a practical generosity and large-hearted benevolence which will never be forgotten by a suffering and afflicted people whose gratitude they cannot find fitting words to express. [Applause.]

Mr. COX, of New York. The House will remember that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARTRIDGE] at the last session introduced a bill in reference to quarantine regulations. That bill had a national scope and significance. The House, by an amendment which I offered, reserved and preserved the local police regulations connected with quarantine already hitherto established.

I think that any lawyer of this House who will look at the case of Ogden vs. Gibbons, 9th Wheaton, page 1, will see that quarantine is a police regulation. We must not, in our anxieties, forget that it is a State institution, and that it will lose its efficiency just so far as we make it an institution of a general nature, without practical accountability to the local authorities of the State or city.

My friend from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] praises the city of Mobile, where he found just quarantine regulations. He says that Mobile was rescued from the yellow fever by her own local municipal police regulations. Why was that? It was because Mobile had a municipal quarantine as Philadelphia has, as Boston has, as New York has. And I would ask of this proposed commission that when they come to investigate this matter they shall not seek in any way to overturn local police regulations, by means of which they have guarded so carefully, scientifically, and equitably against disease in our various ports and places.

This is not a new question before this House. We have tried to anticipate all these disasters. Sacrifices must be borne. But for sacrifices there will be no salvation. From the time of Calvary till now, nothing has ever been gained of goodness and greatness except through sacrifice.

I would be willing to repeat all the plaudits which gentlemen have made here, if I had the power and the rhetoric, in honor of those who sent relief to the South in their hour of danger and suffering.

But one thing I will not sacrifice. It is the local police and municipal regulations by which alone these great disasters can be prevented. There is only one way to prevent the yellow fever from spreading from New Orleans to Dakota, from Savannah to New York, and that is by strict non-intercourse with the tropical islands. I say "non-intercourse." "This involves self-sacrifice." You must make sacrifices, gentlemen of the South, in the matter of commerce. I have the assurance from practical men, not merely scientific men, but men who have had experience and know what they speak of, that in order to stop the yellow fever from coming here you must have "non-intercourse" with the islands and countries of the tropics; you must sacrifice, or all your legislation will not avail.

Mr. GARFIELD. While I agree heartily with what the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has just said, that in a time of threatened pestilence it is vitally essential that we have non-intercourse with the countries where the yellow fever is indigenous, yet I would inquire how the State of Louisiana, for instance, can have non-intercourse when the Government of the United States controls the mouth of the Mississippi and the high seas?

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARTRIDGE] introduced a bill last session to meet that case. The President says that bill has not yet become operative. Let us be quiet. Do not be in a hurry to trench upon municipal rules and regulations. I have stood here for years contending for New York and other local quarantine regulations. I will not oppose this resolution. Let it pass; let us have the largest inquiry and the best remedial legislation possible.

Mr. HOOKER. This will not interfere at all with the local quarantine regulations.

Mr. YOUNG. I desire to say a few words on a different branch of the subject. It is yet too early, it seems to me, to discuss the constitutional power of Congress to enact any law for the protection of the public health. A question more important and material to be considered now is the resolution before the House. I have no objection to it. It meets my entire concurrence. In view, however, of the action of the Senate, it might be well to have this resolution recommitted to the Committee on Rules, that they may have a conference with some members of the other branch. As the House knows, a resolution was adopted yesterday by the Senate creating a separate committee of that body, which has been already appointed. If we now adopt a resolution concurrent in form, providing for the appointment of a joint committee, the Senate, in order to concur in our resolution, would necessarily have to rescind its action of yesterday.

In order, therefore, that there may be no complication about this matter, I would suggest that the resolution reported by the gentleman from Ohio be recommitted to the Committee on Rules, that they may confer with some members of the Senate. This course would probably prevent some delay which otherwise may occur.

This is an important question to us, and one which should be acted on promptly. I foresee that if this resolution in its present form be adopted it will in all probability be rejected by the Senate and sent back, so that we shall have to conform our action to the action taken yesterday by that body.

I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that the Senate resolution of yesterday, with some trifling modifications, be submitted to the House in lieu of the resolution reported from the Committee on Rules, or that the whole matter be recommitted to the Committee on Rules for further consideration. If the gentleman from Ohio has no objection I believe I will test the sense of the House by submitting a resolution similar in form to that adopted yesterday by the Senate, but embracing the necessary alterations. Has the gentleman from Ohio anything to say on that point?

Mr. GARFIELD. I am not instructed by the committee to accept any proposition of that kind; but, of course, we all want to get this matter in the best possible shape, and it is proper that the judgment of the House be taken on any proposition which the gentleman may desire to submit. It strikes me in the outset that if the Senate and the House have different committees we shall double the expense of the investigation, and perhaps obtain two reports which will run in different grooves; so that between the two we may get into a wrangle and accomplish nothing. It seems to me it would be far better to have but one committee, a joint committee of the two Houses, so that the conclusion reached shall be one conclusion, not two. Besides, with a joint committee the expense need not be much more than half what it would be otherwise. For this reason I should prefer a joint committee.

Mr. YOUNG. I do not wish to be understood as objecting at all to this report.

The resolution reported by Mr. GARFIELD was adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOOD. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at one o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ATKINS: The petition of W. C. McHaney, of Henderson County, Tennessee, for compensation for cotton taken by the United States Army—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BREWER: Papers relating to the claim of Elias and Eunice O. Brewer—to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. CHITTENDEN: The petition of ladies of the Church of Messiah, of Brooklyn, New York, for such legislation as will make effective the anti-polygamy law of 1862—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DIBRELL: The petition of the bishop of Tennessee, for compensation for damages to St. Peter's and St. Paul's church building at Chattanooga, Tennessee, used by the United States Army—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HATCHER: The petition of Silas Knox, of New Madrid, Missouri, for compensation for property taken by the United States Army—to the same committee.

By Mr. JONES, of Ohio: The petition of citizens of Union Township, Union County, Ohio, to grant to the Union Township Monumental Association four pieces of condemned ordnance of the United States and sixteen cannon-balls for the ornamentation of the soldiers' monument erected in said township—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LAPHAM: Resolutions of the commissioners of emigration of the State of New York, and of the superintendents of the poor of said State, in convention assembled, favoring the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 3704) to regulate immigration—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. REED: The petition of Henry En Earl, for arrears of pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SHALLENBERGER: The petition of Dr. D. McKinney, that a pension be granted James Bruien, late sergeant of Company H, Forty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers—to the same committee.

By Mr. WIGGINTON: The petition of P. M. C. Lockette and 62 others, for the establishment of a post-route from Mariposa, via Lewis Ranch, to Union post-office, California—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. WILSON: The petition of Anderson Langford, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of J. E. Reeside, for compensation for carrying United States mails—to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. WRIGHT: The petition of Levi Arnold, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 9, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

GEORGE F. HOAR, a Senator from the State of Massachusetts, and ROSCOE CONKLING and FRANCIS KERNAN, Senators from the State of New York, appeared in their seats to-day.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 5307) to correct an error of enrollment in bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 4962) for the relief of Morton C. Fisher; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5315) to restore the records and files in the district and circuit courts of the United States for the western district of Texas, lately destroyed by fire.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution authorizing the appointment of a commission consisting of Senators and Representatives to inquire into the recent history and means of prevention and arrest of yellow fever and other epidemic diseases; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. No. 1367) to aid in the protection of the public buildings and property against loss and damage by fire;

A bill (S. No. 824) establishing the rank of the senior inspector-general;

A bill (S. No. 1133) for the relief of William Gibson; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1625) granting a pension to Abram V. Miller, late a lieutenant in Company E of the One hundred and eighty-fourth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting, in compliance with the requirement of section 208 of the Revised Statutes, a statement of the fees collected, accounted for, and reported by the various diplomatic and consular officers of the United States during the year which ended December 31, 1877; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

EXPENSES OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, communicating, in obedience to law, estimates of the receipts and expenditures of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and June 30, 1880; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WHYTE. I present the petition of Professor F. Miles, Dr. R. M. Sherry, W. C. Van Bibber, John R. Uhler, D. C. Gilman, D. R. Uhler, and other citizens of Maryland, praying for the passage of a law creating a commission to inquire into the nature and treatment of yellow fever and allied epidemic diseases. Inasmuch as there has been a select committee already appointed for that purpose, I move the reference of this petition to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE presented the petition of S. Rosenfeld & Co., of Baltimore, Maryland, praying for the passage of a law refunding to them certain taxes erroneously paid upon tobacco, snuff, and cigars; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KERNAN. I present thirteen petitions of citizens of the State of New York, ex-volunteer soldiers in the late war, praying for the passage of a bill providing for the payment of arrears of pension. I move their reference to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN presented a resolution adopted by the board of commissioners of emigration and also by a convention of superintendents of the poor of the State of New York, recommending the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 3704) granting protection to immigrants and at the same time preventing them from becoming a charge upon the cities, counties, and towns of that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KIRKWOOD presented the petition of William Crum, of Johnson County, Iowa, praying to have refunded to him certain internal-revenue taxes improperly collected from him on distilled spirits; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of Surgeon George F. Winslow, of the United States Navy, praying that the date of his commission in the Navy may be changed from the 2d of April, 1875, to the 27th of May, 1871; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BECK. I present additional evidence in the claim of John Thorns, of Fayette County, Kentucky, praying to be allowed compensation for corn, oats, hay, fuel, and other quartermaster stores taken for the use of and used by the Army of the United States in the years 1862, 1863, and 1864. The bill for his relief (S. No. 66) is now on the Calendar, and I wish to have it recommitted to the Committee on Claims for the purpose of considering the additional evidence. I have conferred with the chairman of that committee, and the motion to recommit has his approbation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That will be a resolution, and it will lie on the table until that order is reached. The additional papers will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McMILLAN. I present a memorial of the Veteran Association of Minnesota in favor of the passage of the House bill providing for the payment of arrears of pension. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I may be permitted to say——

Mr. INGALLS. The Committee on Pensions have had that subject under consideration for the past two years and have reported two bills upon the subject, one of which is now upon the table and the other before the House of Representatives. I ask that this and all similar petitions may lie upon the table.

Mr. McMILLAN. The request that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs was a mistake on my part; it was not intentional. I desire that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator misunderstood me. The bill on that subject has been reported to the Senate, and I ask that the petition lie upon the table.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is satisfactory, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be entered and the petition will lie upon the table.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the petition of Mrs. L. H. Price, Mary E. Babcock, Bessie E. Morton, Mrs. S. Stirritt, C. Hardin, Augustus Briggs, and others, citizens of Monmouth, Warren County, Illinois; the petition of Mrs. L. T. F. Davis, Harriet N. Graves, Sarah A. Soule, Ida M. Morgan, Jessie Lee, Frederick Morgan, and others, citizens of Belvidere, Thayer County, Nebraska; the petition of Louise Paine Horan, Mrs. Elizabeth Tyler, Emily R. Derby, Thompson H. Murch, and others, citizens of Rockland, Knox County, Maine; the petition of Mrs. Eliza W. Hedges, Mrs. M. Morris, J. F. Hedges, William Woodward, and others, citizens of Cynthiana, Harrison County, Kentucky; the petition of Sarah R. Hand, Anna Kerr, Juline Bates, Homer G. Bates, Andrew Kerr, and others, citizens of Steuben, Crawford County, Pennsylvania; and the petition of Almira W. Anthony, Mary P. Wheeler, Sarah A. Owen, Levi Gilbert, John H. Babcock, and others, citizens of Kasson, Dodge County, Minnesota, praying for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. BURNSIDE presented the petition of S. Moffitt and others, praying, on behalf of Sophia Vincent, widow of Martin Vincent, late of Company E, Fourteenth Regiment United States Infantry, that she be allowed arrears of pension, and also for the amendment of the pension laws so as to allow pensions from the date of the death or discharge of the soldiers to whom granted; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONKLING. I have received thirty-seven petitions from soldiers and the widows of soldiers of the late war praying the passage of the House bill granting arrears of pension. I move their reference to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of Patrick Bolton, late sergeant of Company F, Fifty-first Regiment New York Volunteers, praying to be restored to the pension-roll; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Ann M. Paulding, widow of Hiram Paulding, deceased, late senior rear-admiral of the United States Navy, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PADDOCK presented the petition of Frank North and others, citizens of Nebraska, praying for the establishment of a post-route from the North Platte to the Running Water in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. McDONALD presented the petition of Abram F. Farrar, late captain of Company F, Thirty-fifth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, praying to be granted a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WHYTE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1444) for the relief of S. Rosenfeld & Co.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ARMSTRONG asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1445) for the relief of Eugene Wells; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have been requested to introduce a bill for promoting the efficiency of the corps of chaplains of the United States Navy, and to ask that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; and I take this occasion to invite the early attention of the Committee on Naval Affairs to the bill which I present.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1446) for promoting the efficiency of the corps of chaplains of the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1447) to establish a mail-route in the State of Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1448) to establish certain post-roads in the State of Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1449) for the relief of S. D. Houston; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1450) making an appropriation for continuing the improvement of the Missouri River at Atchison, Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1451) authorizing the construction of a breakwater and a harbor of refuge on the Pacific coast; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that the bill lie on the table for the present, and I give notice that at an early day I shall call it up and submit some remarks in favor of the proposition.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1452) making an appropriation to improve the entrance to Coos Bay and harbor, Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BURNSIDE (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1453) for the relief of Major James Belger; which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1454) granting a pension to Ann M. Paulding, widow of Hiram Paulding, late senior rear-admiral of the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONKLING. I am requested to ask leave to introduce a bill of which I have no personal knowledge as to its merits.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1455) to reward Augustus Watson for inventing and introducing stamped newspaper-wrappers on sale at post-offices for seventeen years; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. McDONALD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1456) granting a pension to Abram F. Farrar; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PADDOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1457) for the better protection of life during marine disasters; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1458) to establish certain post-routes in the State of Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. HOAR asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1459) for the relief of Francis S. Davidson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Mr. BECK. The motion I rose to make some time ago I believe is now in order. I move that the bill (S. No. 66) for the relief of John Thorns, of Fayette County, Kentucky, the vote of indefinite postponement having been reconsidered at the last session, be recommitted to the Committee on Claims, to whom additional evidence in the case was to-day referred.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To this the Chair hears no objection, and the order will be entered.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. PLUMB submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 5218) to establish post-routes in the several States herein named; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

AMENDMENT OF PATENT LAWS.

Mr. BOOTH. I wish to give notice that on Wednesday next, that being the day for which the bill is made a special order, I shall offer certain amendments to the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes. I send the amendments to the Chair and ask that they be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They will be printed and laid upon the table, subject to the call of the Senator from California.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. FERRY, it was Ordered, That the bill (H. R. No. 5217) to fix the pay of letter-carriers be taken from the Calendar and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. No. 4962) for the relief of Morton C. Fisher was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. No. 5315) to restore the records and files in the district and circuit courts of the United States for the western district of Texas, lately destroyed by fire, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 5307) to correct an error of enrollment in the bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. DORSEY. I should like to have that matter considered now. It simply proposes to re-enact what was passed at the last session of Congress in regard to the Hot Springs reservation, and which was omitted in the enrollment of the act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be reported at length.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and was interrupted by

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think that bill ought to pass without being printed and going to a committee. I notice what I think, as far as has been read, one omission in it; that is, I think it will be so construed as not to provide any compensation for the labor of the commissioners during this interval, as it speaks of the commission; there may be some subsequent clause, but as far as the reading has proceeded that seems to be the effect; and it is too important a bill to pass in this way, in my belief. I hope that it will be printed and go to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be printed under the rule. To the motion of the Senator from Vermont the Chair hears no objection.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PREVENTION OF EPIDEMIC DISEASES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That a commission is hereby authorized and constituted, to consist of four (4) Senators, to be appointed by the Senate; five (5) members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker; and experts not exceeding seven (7) in number, to be selected by and associated with them, with authority to determine the time and place of meeting, to employ stenographers and clerks, to take testimony, and by subcommittees to visit the recently infected localities and other places, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the recent history and the means of prevention and arrest of yellow fever and other epidemic diseases, and to report the facts and their opinions and recommendations by bill or otherwise, at any time.

Mr. HARRIS. Supposing the proper reference of that resolution would be to the select committee raised by the Senate to investigate the same matter, the select committee has had the concurrent resolution under consideration; and in view of the fact that the Senate has appointed a Senate committee charged with the investigation of the same matter, which committee has already organized and is ready to enter upon the work, with the hope that when the House is informed of that action it will adopt similar action, and the two committees may act together, the select committee have instructed me to recommend to the Senate non-concurrence in the concurrent resolution of the House; and I make that recommendation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the House resolution just reported?

The resolution was not concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to inquire whether the House of Representatives has been notified of the action of the Senate in respect to the appointment of the select committee of which the Senator from Tennessee is chairman?

Mr. HARRIS. I think no formal notice has been given the House of Representatives of the action of the Senate in the appointment of the committee referred to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No formal notice has been given.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move, then, that the Secretary be directed to transmit to the House a copy of the Senate resolution, with the names of the Senators appointed as such committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be entered.

IMMUNITY OF DIPLOMATIC AGENTS.

Mr. BAYARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interests, copies of all correspondence which has recently been had by the Department of State with any foreign power, or its legation in this country, respecting the immunity of diplomatic agents of a foreign government from judicial proceedings against them while received as such and residing in the United States; and also whether, in his opinion, the laws of the United States in that regard, as contained in the Revised Statutes, require amendment.

ELECTION IN SOUTH CAROLINA AND LOUISIANA.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, requested to furnish the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interests, with copies of reports of United States marshals and other officials, and such other correspondence as he may have relative to the recent election in the States of South Carolina and Louisiana.

OREGON STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate a statement of all amounts, together with rates, paid by the War Department of the Government to the Oregon Steam Navigation Company of Portland, Oregon, for Government transportation, and for hire of steamboats used in transporting troops and property, respectively and separately, during each of the ten years last past, on the Columbia River and its tributaries above Fort Vancouver, Washington Territory.

INDIAN TRIBES IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. GARLAND submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire whether it will not be wise and expedient by appropriate legislation—

First. To provide for the revision of the existing laws regulating intercourse with the Indian tribes in the Indian Territory.

Second. To issue and deliver to the treasurers or other proper authorities of said nations, bonds of the United States bearing 4½ per cent. interest in lieu of all moneys held in trust for them by the United States, except the funds for educational purposes, and of the capital of all annuities and annual payments due and made to them under existing treaties and laws, and of all bonds of any of the States held in trust for them, and of all other moneys due any of them by virtue of express stipulations of treaties; with direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain the amounts for which such bonds should issue; and in case of disagreement between himself and the authorities or delegates of either of said nations as to the extent or amount of any of such indebtedness, to refer the same to the Court of Claims for adjudication, to be there proceeded upon like other claims upon contracts against the United States.

SPECIAL ORDERS ON THE CALENDAR.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to make an inquiry if it is in order to do so. I find at the head of the Calendar placed on our tables this morning two bills marked "special orders," one of which was made a special order for the 1st of April last and the other for the 18th of April. Those days having gone by, I wish to inquire of the President of the Senate whether those bills are still special orders, and, if so, for what day? It seems to me that the order making them special orders has become obsolete. I do not know, however, what the practice of the Senate is, and I should like to know for certain reasons whether or no they are special orders.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that they have lost their place as special orders.

AMENDMENT OF PATENT LAWS.

Mr. WINDOM submitted the following resolution:

Whereas it is alleged that the United States patent system, which was intended for the encouragement and protection of meritorious inventors, has become in many cases the instrument of dishonest speculators and unscrupulous assignees, agents, and attorneys, whereby the grossest injustice and most intolerable oppressions are perpetrated in the name and by the authority of the Government: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Patents be instructed to consider the expediency of substituting some other mode of compensating inventors in place of the existing monopoly and royalty system, and that pending such investigation the said committee be further instructed to inquire what amendments, if any, may be necessary to give adequate protection to the public and to prevent further unjust and odious exactions under the patent laws, and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, no one appreciates more highly than myself the skill and genius of the American inventor. I know something of his immense contributions to the wealth and productive power of this country, and none shall excel me in efforts to provide for him all reasonable and proper encouragement and protection. In proposing a radical modification of the patent laws I wage no war upon the honest inventor, but seek to protect the public from a class of reckless speculators and patent knaves, who, by the aid of your laws, fatten upon both the inventor and the public. The proposition is in the interest of the meritorious inventor as well as of the community at large. There is a prevailing conviction in the public mind that the system of granting monopolies as a reward for inventions is of very questionable expediency at best, and recent transactions in several western States have so intensified that conviction that I am satisfied a majority of the people would to-day vote to abolish the entire system. They are quite willing to concede a fair and reasonable compensation to the meritorious inventor, but they are not willing that such compensation shall any longer take the form of an odious monopoly, whereby they may be insulted, harassed, and robbed, as has been recently done in certain notorious cases. They will pay for the results of brain work and the productions of genius as freely as for physical labor, but they will not any longer cheerfully consent that a system which was designed to encourage and protect honest inventors shall be so perverted as to become the instrument by which pretended inventions may be bought or stolen, and then employed, under the authority of the United States, as the means of insulting, oppressing, and plundering the public.

The patent laws seem to have been framed wholly in the interest of the patentee and of the conscienceless speculator who may be sharp enough to obtain control of his monopoly, but with an utter disregard of the rights and interests of the people. For instance, when the decision of an examiner is in favor of a patent there is no review or supervision in the interest of the public, and his action is final and the patent issues. But when he rejects an application there is an appeal, first to the board of examiners, next to the Commissioner himself, and finally, if all these fail to pull him through, the applicant may go to one of the courts of the District of Columbia, where, as a rule, absolutely nothing is known of the "state of the art" bearing upon the invention or the rules and usages which should govern in patent cases. With all these chances in his favor, and usually urging an ex parte case, where no adverse interest is present to suggest objections, it is no wonder that the applicant generally succeeds and that the country is flooded with worthless patents whose only practical use can be to embarrass honest inventors, to discourage really meritorious inventions, to harass and plunder the public, and to bring the entire system into disrepute.

Under existing laws and usages, mistakes on the part of examiners are inevitable. In the first place, under the pretense of economy, we deny to the office a sufficient force or an adequate compensation and compel the employment of the lowest grade of clerks, and sometimes of messengers and laborers, in the responsible duty of examiners. But even if this bad phase of demagogism were removed, it would still be impossible in the very nature of the case, under existing laws, to avoid mistakes which unfortunately almost invariably occur in the interest of the applicant who is present and to the detriment of the public who are not heard. Take an illustration. The applicant appears with some device which he claims to be new and useful. No public notice is given of his application, and nobody but himself, his attorney, and the examiner know anything about it. The examiner searches the records of the office and finds no claim or patent with which, in his judgment, this one is an interference, and as he does not happen to know of any like device in practical use he orders the patent to issue. Substantially the same thing may have been in use a dozen years, and in as many States, but if his observation does not happen to have been sufficiently ubiquitous to have included it, and if the applicant is not kind enough to call his attention to a fact that would defeat his own case—nobody else can—he proceeds to clothe the patentee with special prerogative to go forth in the name and by the authority of the United States to levy contributions upon the public at his own will and pleasure.

In the present crowded condition of business in the Patent Office, and owing to inadequate appropriations, these examinations and decisions are frequently made, as I am informed, by a half-starved, lowest-grade clerk, or even a messenger, who may thus confer upon some shrewd and unscrupulous applicant a power of taxation as absolute as, and in its form and essence far more arbitrary and offensive than, Congress itself would dare to exercise. I am making no complaint against the United States Patent Office as now administered, for I am convinced it is far more conservative and careful now than a few years ago. I am speaking of the system itself.

Do you answer that the people have the courts for their protection, and if the claims of the patentee are invalid or unjust they may be successfully resisted? True, but how much protection do your courts afford after you have armed a man with the prima facie right to collect $5 or $10 each from ten thousand people? Is it any special gratification to those people to be told that by paying from one hundred to a thousand dollars attorney fees and risking as much more in the costs of contesting in the United States courts they can possibly avoid the payment of $5 or $10 royalty? Such advice may appeal to their stubbornness and pride, or even to their patriotism, but not to a poor man's discretion. And usually the sharp swindlers who take advantage of your patent-laws to cheat and rob the public are shrewd enough to make up a "friendly case," in which their confederates are on both sides, and under the false pretense of contesting the validity of the patent, while in fact withholding from the court all knowledge of its defects, they procure a decision of the United States circuit court, and sometimes even of the Supreme Court of the United States itself, affirming its validity.

Thus armed with a sovereign prerogative often fraudulently obtained in the first place, and then fraudulently confirmed by misleading the courts, the conspirators are ready for work, and agencies are established at some convenient point in each State and the people are ordered to present themselves humbly in the august presence of the favored owners of this fragment of sovereign power and pay such "royalty" as they may be pleased to assess. Good care is taken to publish the facts, that the patent has been issued by the Government and confirmed by some United States district court, and then notice is given that if settlement be not made at once suits will be commenced. Very often suits are commenced without any notice. And, as if to stimulate their victims to respond more promptly to the exactions of these plunderers, whom we have thus authorized to prey upon the public, our laws provide that in case the people are tardy in paying said "royalty," and suits are brought to enforce such payments, triple damages may be assessed by the courts. Section 59 of the act approved July 8, 1870, reads:

> That damages for the infringement of any patent may be recovered by action on the case in any circuit court of the United States, or district court exercising the jurisdiction of a circuit court, or in the supreme court of the District of Columbia or of any Territory, in the name of the party interested either as patentee, assignee, or grantee. And whenever in any such action a verdict shall be rendered for the plaintiff the court may enter judgment thereon for any sum above the amount found by the verdict as the actual damages sustained, according to the circumstances of the case, not exceeding three times the amount of such verdict, together with the costs.

It will be observed that this section gives to the "party interested either as patentee, assignee, or grantee" in that sacred thing known as a patent the right to bring his suit almost anywhere and in almost any court in the United States or Territories, without reference to the residence, the convenience, or the expense of the defendant, who may be mercilessly dragged into a distant State or Territory if a judge can be anywhere found in the interest of the plaintiff. And after a jury has deliberately ascertained upon their oaths the "actual damages sustained" the court may treble them as a punishment to the defendant for daring to question the royal prerogatives of the patentee.

Nor does the law stop even here in its relentless determination to hunt down and ruin every person who may have the temerity to appeal to the courts for protection against the favored owner or assignee of a patent. Fearing, apparently, that the section just quoted might leave some open door of escape for the public and that the patentee might still lack some extreme power to enforce his reactions, section 55 of the same act authorizes an injunction—

> To prevent the violation of any right secured by patent on such terms as the court may deem reasonable; and upon a decree being rendered in any such action for an infringement, the complainant shall be entitled to recover, in addition to the profits to be accounted for by the defendant, the damages the complainant has sustained thereby, and the court shall assess the same or cause the same to be assessed under its direction, and the court shall have the same powers to increase the same in its discretion that are given by said act to increase the damages found by verdicts in actions upon the case.

In plain English this section means—

First, that the defendant's business may be closed by an injunction.

Second, that all his profits from the use of the patent shall be confiscated and given to the patent owner.

Third, that, in addition to closing his business and confiscating his property, he shall pay to the complainant all the damages the latter has sustained.

And if the court and the complainant are not satisfied that all this is enough to utterly ruin the defendant, the court is authorized to finish the work by increasing the damages assessed by itself three hundred per cent. I doubt if the statutes of this or any other civilized country exhibit a specimen of legislation so grossly unjust and so utterly indefensible as this.

Is it any wonder when the owner of a patent is armed with such powers, obtained direct from the Government, fraudulently confirmed by means of a friendly case in some United States court, and backed by a statute of the United States threatening confiscation and triple damages to all who question or delay, the people will sometimes pay millions of dollars in small sums rather than risk a contest in which they find the Patent Office, the United States courts, and even Congress itself against them, and which in the end may prove their utter ruin? The wonder is that they have so long tolerated such laws. The injustice of a system is often best demonstrated by the results it produces. I have a case in mind which illustrates better than any I have ever observed the defects, absurdities, and dangers of the existing system and the intolerable wrongs and oppressions which may be and are practiced under it.

Some twelve years ago the United States Patent Office, after a full and careful investigation, twice rejected the application of one Nelson W. Green for a patent on what is popularly known as the "drive-well" process, which consisted of nothing more than driving an iron rod into the soft ground until water is reached, then withdrawing the rod and inserting a perforated tube into the hole, through which water is drawn by means of a pump. The evidence now seems to be conclusive that long before Green's application was made, or his pretended invention conceived, the same or a similar process had been in practical use in several places. The Patent Office ascertained upon inquiry at the time that other parties antedated the Green claim and awarded the patent to them.

Being unable to procure favorable action in the Patent Office, where the merits of his case were understood and appreciated, Green appealed to one of the courts of the District of Columbia, where, without an adequate investigation and with little or no knowledge of the rules and usages applicable to such cases, the judge, upon some sort of a compromise between the parties, ordered the issue of two patents, one to Suggett for the "perforated pipes and point for sinking wells," and one to Green for the "broad claim of sinking wells by driving down the pump or rod without removing the dirt upward." In other words, for the marvelous discovery that a "hole" could be made in soft ground by driving an iron rod into it, a court of the District of Columbia authorized and empowered Green to proceed to levy contributions, amounting to millions of dollars, on the people of the United States; and a like authority was also conferred on Suggett for his discovery that water could be drawn through a "perforated pipe."

In 1866, a case involving the validity of Green's patent was tried in the United States circuit court for the southern district of New York. Whether or not it was a "friendly case," in which the conspirators were on both sides, I am not advised; but the decision of the judge on some of the points raised is painfully suggestive of such a suspicion. One of the principal grounds upon which the validity of the patent was challenged was that said Green had delayed his application some four or five years after he pretended to have made the discovery, and therefore must be held to have abandoned it to the public. But, as appears from the decision of the Court, the public was not to be protected in that way, and hence some excuse must be found for the delay. The judge stated that the "delay must certainly be deemed extraordinary," but that it was excused by the "unusual circumstances" which attended it.

Those "unusual circumstances" which in the opinion of the court afforded a "sufficient excuse" were recited by Judge Benedict in substance as follows: That soon after his invention the said "Green had felt compelled to shoot McNett, one of the captains of a regiment" which he (Green) was then raising for the war; that "the effect upon Green was disastrous in the extreme;" that the people of the county were so outraged by the act that his "regiment required the protection of a battery to save it from their violence;" that "it was removed to Washington, where Green was relieved from command and then dismissed the service and subjected to military charges;" that "he was in addition harassed by civil suits brought to charge him with personal liability for articles used by his regiment;" that "he was also arrested and indicted for shooting McNett;" that he only escaped conviction by a disagreement of the jury;" that "during this period he became involved in church difficulties, was expelled from the church, and compelled to appeal to the bishop," and "was also involved in litigation with his pastor."

The grounds upon which the court excused the "extraordinary delay" and denied to the public rights accruing from Green's lack of ordinary vigilance seemed to me so remarkable that my curiosity was stimulated to make further inquiry as to the character of some of the transactions which, in the opinion of the court, "furnished a proper excuse" for omitting the vigilance usually required of patentees for the protection of the public.

In an able report upon the subject made by Judge-Advocate Holt, in which he carefully reviewed the facts produced on Green's criminal trial, he stated some of his conclusions as follows:

> The entire evidence and the charge of the judge in summing up the case having now been read, the conclusion is arrived at by this bureau that Green was not justified in shooting McNett, that his act was in itself reckless and intemperate, and was not necessary for the purpose of enforcing discipline.
> The action by the latter (Green) must be viewed precisely as it would be viewed if he had killed McNett; and the opinion is entertained that this action resorted to under the circumstances described, and not in the field before the enemy, but in a camp situated in the heart of a loyal State, was altogether without justification.

In other words, after a most careful examination of the case the learned judge advocate arrived at the conclusion that the act of shooting McNett was a clear case of intended murder on the part of said Green, and that his action must be viewed precisely as if the murderous intent had succeeded.

It is not surprising, therefore, that, in the language of Judge Benedict, "the effect upon Green was disastrous in the extreme," but the extraordinary feature of the case is, that we suffer to remain upon our statute-books a system of laws which a United States circuit court of moderate intelligence, and presumably honest, felt compelled to construe in so extraordinary a manner. The vigilance required of inventors in making known their claims through the Patent Office is designed for the protection of the public, and yet here is a case where such vigilance was excused because through an unsuccessful attempt to commit murder the applicant became involved in so many troubles with his regiment, troubles with his neighbors, troubles with the grand jury, troubles with the criminal courts, with his Government, with his church, and with his pastor, that he could not be expected to find time to give notice of his pretended invention by applying for a patent, and therefore, owing to the extreme pressure of his engagements, he must be excused from complying with the ordinary conditions required of inventors and the public must be saddled with an odious monopoly for his benefit. It will be readily admitted that Green must have been very busy during those troublesome years, but his engagements do not seem to have differed materially from those which usually engage the attention of men who "feel compelled" to violate the criminal laws. Certainly they were not of so meritorious a nature as to justify a sensible and honest court, acting under just and reasonable laws, in granting him special favors at the expense of the people. Presuming that court to have been both sensible and honest, I think no further argument is necessary to show that our patent laws are sadly in need of radical modification.

The evidence, as I have said, is now very conclusive that the same device or process on which the court in the District of Columbia ordered a patent after it had been twice refused by the Patent Office was in use in several States before Green pretended to have made his invention, and yet a patent without even the merit of originality granted to a man with such a record, and granted, too, partly because of that very record, has been put into the hands of a ring of knavish agents and attorneys, who in the name and by authority of the Government of the United States are now robbing the people of millions of dollars. It is said by those best informed that their plunder already amounts to several hundred thousands, and will eventually reach, if unchecked, from seven to ten millions. Not content with exacting from the hundreds and thousands of poor people who are unable to pay anything the "royalty" of $10 which they themselves have fixed, their disreputable agents and attorneys resort to all kinds of villainous tricks to increase their ill-gotten gains by means of the law which authorizes confiscation and triple damages in case a suit is brought. To this end notices of their demands are published, if at all, in places least likely to attract the attention of their victims, or the time is so short that the people are unable to pay, or when the time for payment is fixed, suits are sometimes commenced before the expiration of the period named by themselves.

I am informed by the newspapers, that in one town of Minnesota the people were notified to deposit $10 each by a certain day, in a bank named. Many of them made the required deposit on the day fixed, but were astonished and outraged beyond measure to find that suits had been commenced against them that morning, and that they must either pay $46.50 or incur the greater expense of attorney fees and the costs of contesting the case through the circuit and Supreme courts of the United States. This villainous bill of costs embraces among other things "$30 for triple damages" authorized by the laws of the United States, and "$6.50 for drawing and printing the complaint."

This kind of rascality is being committed, not in Minnesota alone, but in several other western States, and will extend to every other State in the Union where the common device has been practiced of obtaining water from a hole in soft ground, made by driving into it a rod of iron and inserting a perforated tube. And when the people shall have paid from seven to ten millions for this wonderful discovery the plunderers, grown rich and, if possible, more insolent by their intolerable extortions, will be ready to harvest another crop of "royalties" from the same victims for Suggett's "new and useful," not to say marvelous, invention, whereby the world has been taught the astonishing fact that water may be drawn through a "perforated pipe." This case is by no means exceptional in the history of wrongs and oppressions which have been committed under our laws. I have mentioned it merely to illustrate some of the villainies that are perpetrated under the present system and some of the public grievances which, if not speedily removed by judicious modifications of the law, will result in sweeping the entire system from the statutes.

The proceedings I would now suggest as a remedy for these wrongs is, that Congress carefully consider the expediency of substituting some other mode of compensating inventors in place of the existing "monopoly" and "royalty" system which, in its very nomenclature and nature, is utterly repugnant to our American ideas, and in its practical application intolerably offensive and unjust.

Pending the consideration of this radical change, several amendments may be made which will greatly improve the present system and relieve it of some of its most unjust, irritating, and dangerous features.

I submit that under all the circumstances it is high time Congress address itself to the task of providing some remedy for the injustice and legalized robbery which are being perpetrated under our own laws. If the existing system can be so amended as to properly reward the inventor and at the same time afford adequate protection to the public, let it be so amended; but if such protection to the public be impossible, then let it be abolished at once and forever.

It is high time that we should cease to legislate wholly in the interest of inventors and their assignees, and remember that the public have some rights which even patentees and legislators are bound to respect. If my resolution shall tend to promote inquiry in that direction it will have contributed something toward the removal of a grievance too intolerable and offensive to be longer patiently endured.

NOTICES OF BUSINESS.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] in pursuance of the notice he gave.

Mr. EDMUNDS. According to that notice, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1308 relating to the method of ascertaining the election of President and Vice-President of the United States.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. Before the Senator from Vermont proceeds with his bill, I desire to give notice that, if agreeable to the Senate, I shall call up the resolutions which I submitted last week, on Wednesday, the day after to-morrow, at one o'clock.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I desire to give notice that there was assigned at the last session of Congress for that day the consideration of the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes, and I shall be compelled to insist that that bill be taken up at that time.

Mr. BLAINE. I shall not detain the Senate very long, and will not interfere with the Senator's bill. How long does the Senator from New Hampshire suppose it would require for the Senate to consider the bill to which he refers?

Mr. WADLEIGH. I do not know. The committee desire that the bill shall be acted on at that time. A reason for action may be found in the speech just made by my friend, the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]

Mr. BLAINE. I think one can be disposed of very promptly and will not be in the way of the other. At all events I shall ask the Senate to hear me briefly at one o'clock on Wednesday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will decide at that time which shall have the preference.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1398) to amend sundry provisions of chapter 1, title 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to presidential elections, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, before I proceed to explain the scope of this bill and to state the views of the committee upon it, I will ask the Senate to allow the correction of one or two typographical errors that appear in the printed bill. In section 3 in the print, line 2, it reads:

The electors of each State shall meet and give their votes upon the second Monday in January.

That should be "on" as a mere matter of taste.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That change will be made if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In section 5, line 3, after the word "chosen," there should be a comma.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be inserted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In section 9 on page 6, line 14, the comma after the word "otherwise" should be stricken out so as to read "or otherwise under this act."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The comma will be erased.

The bill, as amended, was read at length, as follows:

A bill to amend sundry provisions of chapter 1, title 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to presidential elections, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the electors of President and Vice-President shall be appointed in each State on the first Tuesday in October in every fourth year succeeding the election of a President and Vice-President, and on the same day in October whenever there shall be a vacancy in both the offices of President and Vice-President declared and certified as hereinafter provided; but no Senator or Representative or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector.

SEC. 2. Whenever there shall be a vacancy in both the offices of President and Vice-President occurring more than two months next preceding the first Tuesday in any month of October other than that next preceding the expiration of the term of office for which the President and Vice-President last in office were elected, the Secretary of State shall forthwith cause a notification thereof to be made to the executive of every State, and shall also cause the same to be published in at least one of the newspapers printed in each State. The notification shall specify that electors of President and Vice-President of the United States shall be appointed in the several States on the first Tuesday in October then next ensuing.

SEC. 3. The electors of each State shall meet and give their votes on the second Monday in January next following their appointment at such place in each State as the Legislature of such State shall direct.

SEC. 4. Each State may provide, by law enacted prior to the day in this act named for the appointment of the electors, for the trial and determination of any controversy concerning the appointment of electors, before the time fixed for the meeting of the electors, in any manner it shall deem expedient. Every such determination made pursuant to such law so enacted before said day, and made prior to the said time of meeting of the electors, shall be conclusive evidence of the lawful title of the electors who shall have been so determined to have been appointed, and shall govern in the counting of the electoral votes, as provided in the Constitution and as hereinafter regulated.

SEC. 5. It shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State duly ascertained to have been chosen, to be made and certified and to be delivered to the electors on or before the day on which they are required by this act to meet.

SEC. 6. Congress shall be in session on the second Monday in February succeeding every meeting of the electors. The Senate and House of Representatives shall meet in the Hall of the House of Representatives at the hour of one o'clock in the afternoon on that day; and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer. Two tellers shall be previously appointed on the part of the Senate, and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, all the certificates, and papers purporting to be certificates, of the electoral votes, which certificates and papers shall be opened, presented, and acted upon in the alphabetical order of the States, beginning with the letter A; and said tellers, having then read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been ascertained and counted as in this act provided, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote, and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and together with a list of the votes be entered on the Journals of the two Houses. Upon such reading of any such certificate or paper the President of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all objections so made to any vote or paper from a State shall have been received and read the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and such objections shall be submitted to the Senate for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall in like manner submit such objections to the House of Representatives for its decision; and no electoral vote or votes from any State from which but one return has been received shall be rejected except by the affirmative votes of both Houses. If more than one return, or paper purporting to be a return, from a State shall have been received by the President of the Senate, those votes, and those only, shall be counted which shall have been regularly given by the electors who are shown by the evidence mentioned in section 4 of this act to have been appointed; but in case there shall arise the question which of two or more of such State tribunals, determining what electors have been appointed, as mentioned in section 4 of this act, is the lawful tribunal of such State, the votes regularly given of those electors, and those only, from such State shall be counted whose title as electors the two Houses, acting separately, shall concurrently decide is supported by the decision of the tribunal of such State so provided for by its Legislature. And in such case of more than one return, or paper purporting to be a return, from a State, if there shall have been no such determination of the question in the State as aforesaid, then those votes and those only shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall concurrently decide to be the lawful votes of the legally appointed electors of such State. When the two Houses have voted they shall immediately again meet, and the presiding officer shall then announce the decision of the questions submitted. No votes or papers from any other State shall be acted upon until the objections previously made to the votes or papers from any State shall have been finally disposed of.

SEC. 7. That while the two Houses shall be in meeting, as provided in this act, no debate shall be allowed, and no question shall be put by the presiding officer except to either House on a motion to withdraw; and he shall have power to preserve order.

SEC. 8. That when the two Houses separate to decide upon an objection that may have been made to the counting of any electoral vote or votes from any State, or other question arising in the matter, each Senator and Representative may speak to such objection or question five minutes, and not oftener than once; but after such debate shall have lasted two hours it shall be the duty of the presiding officer of each House to put the main question without further debate.

SEC. 9. That at such joint meeting of the two Houses seats shall be provided as follows: For the President of the Senate, the Speaker's chair; for the Speaker, immediately upon his left; the Senators, in the body of the Hall upon the right of the presiding officer; for the Representatives, in the body of the Hall not provided for the Senators; for the tellers, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, at the Clerk's desk; for the other officers of the two Houses, in front of the Clerk's desk and upon each side of the Speaker's platform. Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the count of electoral votes shall be completed and the result declared; and no recess shall be taken unless a question shall have arisen in regard to counting any such votes, or otherwise under this act, in which case it shall be competent for either House, acting separately in the manner hereinbefore provided, to direct a recess of such House not beyond the next day, Sunday excepted, at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon. But if the counting of the electoral votes and the declaration of the result shall not have been completed before the fifth calendar day next after such first meeting of the two Houses, no further or other recess shall be taken by either House.

SEC. 10. That section 140 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, so amended that the words "first Wednesday in January then next ensuing" be stricken out and the words "second Monday next after their meeting" be inserted therein.

SEC. 11. That section 141 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, so amended that the words "first Wednesday" be stricken out and the words "on or before the day" inserted therein.

SEC. 12. That sections 131, 135, 136, 142, 147, 148, and 149 be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the first duty of the committee undoubtedly is to explain to the Senate precisely, and concisely I hope too, what the bill provides. That I will attempt to do briefly.

The first section of the bill changes the time of election from the first Tuesday in November, as I will state it in a general way; it does not always happen upon the first Tuesday, but I state it that way for convenience,—changes the time of choosing the electors from the first Tuesday in November to the first Tuesday in October, making the presidential election in the various States, the appointment of electors, a month earlier than by the present law. And in the same connection I will refer to section 3 which provides that the electors shall meet and give their votes on the second Monday in January next following their appointment, instead of meeting and giving their votes on the first Wednesday in December as now provided by law. The object of these two provisions in sections 1 and 3 is to produce a longer period of time between the choice of electors in the States and the meeting of the electors, in order to dispose of any dispute or question that may arise in respect of who have been chosen as the electors.

The second section of the bill, following the old act of 1792 in respect of providing for vacancies in the offices of President and Vice-President of the United States, provides for a special election, and provides in substance that that special election shall be held in the same way that the regular and general election is, and with the same effect; but it provides that if this vacancy occurs within two months next before the first Tuesday in the October preceding the end of an ordinary presidential term there shall be no special election, but the general election takes its place. If such an event should happen as a vacancy in the offices of both President and Vice-President, I will say for illustration in the first year of the present ordinary and regular term, then there is to be a special election held under a notification from the Secretary of State, conducted in the same way, and the votes counted in the same way, and so on; but that leaves open and raises, I may say, the same question that could exist now under the present law as to the period of time for which this special election is held. The present law (which in respect of the special election is in substance just like that proposed with a little variation of time) does not declare, and the Constitution does not definitely and clearly declare, for how long the President and Vice-President thus elected at a special election shall hold. Under ordinary notions in most of the States we are led to take it that where there is a vacancy in an office and somebody is specially elected or appointed to fill that vacancy, just as it is in respect of a vacancy in the Senate, the specially elected officer only holds to fill out the term. But when the committee came to consider this question as to how long this specially elected President and Vice-President could hold—by "specially elected," I mean elected out of the regular order of four years—we were met by the plain statement in the Constitution that the President and Vice-President of the United States shall hold their offices "during the term of four years;" and thus it would seem to follow that if a vacancy shall occur in both these offices so that the Executive Magistracy of the nation is left unfilled and it is to be filled as soon thereafter as possible in accordance with our republican notions of government, the persons thus elected must hold for four years, starting of course from the ordinary time, or some definite period, say the 4th of March as in the other cases. That might result in the case I have supposed in an election in the first year of the Presidency which should run for four years, and thus change the calendar order of the periods that now exist and have existed since the formation of the Constitution. I think I am safe in saying that, while the committee perhaps would not have thought that that was the best thing to do, but might have thought that the best thing, if it had been left entirely to the discretion of Congress, would be merely to fill up the vacancy and then have the regular election, they perceived that the Constitution in its plain and explicit language left no choice or discretion to Congress, in that particular, but that the plain words of the Constitution must be executed, that if a vacancy should occur in the two offices, I will say in the first or second year of a term, the persons newly elected to fill those offices must hold for the four years that the Constitution speaks of.

That, Mr. President, is not very important in respect of the chief objects of this bill, but still it is due to the Senate that the committee should call its attention to this circumstance which the bill involves, but which it does not involve any more than the present law.

The fourth section, which is one the subject of which gave the committee the greatest difficulty, provides this in substance: that each State may by a law enacted beforehand (so that the law thus enacted shall not be for a particular election or a particular purpose to aid the friends of one candidate rather than another according to the political disposition of the Legislature) provide for the trial and determination of any controversy that may arise in that State respecting who has been chosen or appointed an elector, and that such a determination in accordance with the State laws shall be had before the time of the meeting of the electors, so that no confusion can be produced or conflict of authority in the State, it being decided in advance; and then this action of the State through the methods provided by its Legislature in determining who are its electors in this great act of the choosing of the Chief Magistrate, its determination shall be received at the national capital when the votes are opened and counted, and that it shall not be in the rightful power of whoever is entitled to count the votes, be it the President of the Senate, as some have supposed; be it the two Houses acting independently as two judges on the bench, as some have supposed; be it whatever tribunal Congress may authorize to do this function, as others have supposed; be it what it may, this determination of the State for itself, in advance of the action of the electors as to who the people are whom it has chosen, shall be binding and conclusive in respect of going on with the ceremony of determining the result of the vote. That is the substance of the fourth section.

The fifth section is just what the law is now, that it is the duty of the executive of the State to make and certify three lists of the electors thus ascertained to have been chosen if there be a controversy, and according to the ordinary form if there be not one, which shall be delivered to the electors, and so on, substantially in the way the law now provides.

The sixth section provides in the largest part of it for the mere ceremony, the ordinary procedure in point of form of the counting of these votes; but it also provides for an authentic and responsible determination for the time being at any rate—I say nothing of what would be the ultimate rights of parties in the judicial tribunals—of ascertaining the result, and this provision is what has been practically the course of the history of all these counts from the origin of the Government, and that is that the two Houses shall meet in their respective organized capacities and at a certain time and place, and that the votes shall be opened in a certain order. If there be an objection, that objection shall be stated and signed by a certain number of members of each body, and that then each House shall consider that objection, which, of course, implies that the President of the Senate shall not consider it. They are the bodies to whom whatever objection or question may arise is referred, and their decision is to govern in the disposition of the question; the preceding section, four, having provided the principles upon which that decision, in one aspect of it, that is the identity and lawful title of the electors, shall proceed.

It also provides for a case which has arisen, and which, of course, possibly may arise again; and that is the case of a decision in the State by the methods that its recognized laws have provided, but a decision by two tribunals that its Legislature has set up. If the Legislature has provided by law, for instance, that the supreme court of the State shall decide summarily a dispute as to who has been appointed elector, and if there happen to be two supreme courts in that State, one of them a constitutional and legal one, and the other not, but each claiming that character; or, if the Legislature shall have provided that the Legislature itself shall decide any dispute, and there happen to be two Legislatures each claiming to be the rightful and constitutional Legislature of the State, then this decision of the supreme court or this decision of the Legislature will not govern in the count unless the two Houses concur in finding that the one court or the one Legislature of that State is the true court or the true Legislature. In that case, then, that being ascertained, the decision of the true court or the true Legislature is to govern. But if the two Houses find a state of things in the State so grave, so aggravated, so abnormal, so monstrous I might say as that there are two judicial or two political bodies in a State having all the insignia of character and responsibility and status, then this bill provides that in a conflicting decision of such two bodies in respect of who are the electors of that State neither shall be received until the political power of this Government shall concur in determining which is the true one. That being determined, then of course the decision of the true one follows as in the other case.

It seemed to the committee impossible to provide any more satisfactory means of disposing of a difficulty of this grave, and I am glad to say rare, character than this. We may with propriety say that the act of the State itself, when we know politically what the State is, shall determine whom it has chosen for its electors; but when the State is divided into two political powers, each having a de facto existence, that raises a political question which involves the recognition of the political relations of that State so far as they can be manifested through its actual government to the National Government of the United States, and we thought it safe to say, and indeed the only thing to say, that in a case of that character no State should be recognized in respect of its organized form of government as entitled to have a vote counted for President that the two great political bodies of the Federal Government should not agree in recognizing as the true State.

I believe, Mr. President, that states fairly the point of the sixth section upon that subject. Then the sixth section also provides for the case where a State through neglect or otherwise should have failed to provide for determining for itself, in case of dispute, who are its electors, and a contest should arise afterward without such provision and determination between two sets of men claiming to be such. In that case the bill provides that no contested vote of that character in case of double returns, when the State has not chosen to decide it for itself, shall be received unless both Houses concur in receiving it. There would seem to be no convenient, or indeed theoretically possible, way, so long as the two Houses act, of disposing of that question otherwise, because between contestants of that character, with two judges to decide upon the question and no decision or determination in the State whose duty it is to select and identify the electors, it seems impossible to recognize one set by the vote of one House, rather than the other.

The seventh section provides the ordinary arrangement for the conduct of affairs when the two Houses are met; that is to say, that there shall be no debate, because debate implies the consumption of time, and also implies the necessary consequence of a decision by somebody of the subject debated, and it necessarily follows from that, as this section puts it, that no question shall be put by the presiding officer when the two Houses are thus together except the one of their separation for the purpose named in the act; and it also provides the necessary and proper declaration that the presiding officer shall have power to preserve order.

The eighth section provides that when a question arises in the method and under the forms prescribed in the act the two Houses shall separate, and in order to prevent delays the bill requires that the vote shall be taken in each House presently; that is to say, on a five minutes' debate by any member who wishes to speak, at the end of two hours the main question shall be decided by each House; and then they shall again meet, and the presiding officer shall announce the result of their respective votes.

The ninth section provides for the more orderly formality of seats, &c., and also provides that the joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the whole business is finished. It provides that no recess shall be taken, which is another provision against delay, unless a question such as the act provides for being raised shall have been raised; and in that case it is competent for either House to take a recess not beyond ten o'clock of the next day, Sundays excepted, while each House is having under consideration one of these questions. It then provides, to guard against a conflict of parties and opinions in the two Houses as between each other, that if the counting of the electoral votes and the declaration of the result shall not have been accomplished before the fifth calendar day after the first meeting as provided in the act, no further or other recess shall be taken at all. That is to guard against the possibility that a faction in either House disliking the probable result of an orderly and complete procedure should by dilatory motions and other means undertake to postpone a final disposition of the subject until after the 4th of March, at which time the term of one of the two Houses would have expired ordinarily, and the other would have discontinued its sittings by operation of law.

The tenth, eleventh, and twelfth sections are mere changes of the phraseology, and repeals of some of the sections of the Revised Statutes which stand in conflict with these times of meeting, &c. I need not particularly refer to them.

The first thing, Mr. President, that ought to be considered, undoubtedly, is the state of the Constitution upon this subject, and that is to be found in only two or three places, and in very few and simple words. Article 2, section 1, provides, first, that—

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the Vice-President, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

The electors shall meet in their respective States, &c.

That is in section 1 of article 2; but the existing provision of the Constitution as to the mode of election is in the twelfth amendment, which I will read in lieu of that:

The electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate; the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted; the person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote.

It is unnecessary to read the rest of that provision as this bill does not bear upon it. Article 1, section 8, of the Constitution, clause 18, provides this in defining and declaring the powers of Congress:

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

These provisions of the Constitution I believe are all that bear directly upon the question we now have under consideration, the first being in the natural and logical order of the consideration of this question the one that I first read, the first section of the second article to which I now invite the careful scrutiny and consideration of the honorable members of the Senate who do me the honor to listen to me. The very first statement is after the declaration that the executive power shall be vested in the President, "that each State shall appoint" its electors. This, then, it will be seen, is a duty that is imposed upon the State in language that it appears to me does not admit of doubt or misconstruction. It is the duty of the State in its political and coequal character, with every one of its sisters, to appoint the number of electors to which it is entitled under the Constitution. It is the act of the State, and as Mr. Madison, one of the fathers and constructors of the Constitution, stated in the Federalist, in the time of it and before the Constitution was adopted and as an exposition of the true character of the Constitution in respect of the election of the President, "it is the political act of each one of the States in its definite and independent character," which it was to exercise freely for itself in selecting the persons who were to express its voice in the election of President. He says in the thirty-eighth number of the Federalist:

The next relation is, to the sources from which the ordinary powers of government are to be derived. The House of Representatives will derive its powers from the people of America; and the people will be represented in the same proportion, and on the same principle, as they are in the Legislature of a particular State. So far the government is national, not federal. The Senate, on the other hand, will derive its powers from the States, as political and coequal societies; and these will be represented on the principle of equality in the Senate, as they now are in the existing Congress. So far the government is federal, not national. The executive power will be derived from a very compound source. The immediate election of the President is to be made by the States in their political characters. The votes allotted to them are in a compound ratio, which considers them partly as distinct and coequal societies, partly as unequal members of the same society. The eventual election, again, is to be made by that branch of the legislature which consists of the national Representatives; but in this particular act, they are to be thrown into the form of individual delegations, from so many distinct and coequal bodies-politic. From this aspect of the government, it appears to be of a mixed character, presenting at least as many federal as national features.

The particular declaration to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate, although it is hardly necessary, the language of the Constitution is so plain, is that—

The immediate election of the President is to be made by the States in their political characters.

That is to say, it is the political right of the State as a State to select for itself and without the intervention or decision of any other power, the persons to the number to which it is entitled who are to express its choice in the electoral college for the Chief Magistrate of the Union.

Then it goes on to provide in this same clause:

In such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct.

So that taking the whole clause together it reads:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled.

That not only fortifies, but to my mind clinches conclusively the doctrine that the ultimate selection, the actual, the effectual, selection which is to count in the final expression in this Chamber or in that of the other House where the votes are counted as the voice of the State, is to be made by the State, and it is to be made in the manner that the Legislature of that State may direct. In other words, it is wholly, exclusively, absolutely a matter which the Constitution has remitted to the State and to its authority.

Now, what does "manner" include, Mr. President, in respect of what the Legislature is to do? The language is that the State is to appoint its electors who are to give their votes and whose votes are to be counted here as the voice of the State for President. The Constitution says that the manner of doing that, of this selection, shall be such as the legislative power of the State shall direct. Is it not within the manner of this selection for the Legislature of the State to provide that he and he only shall be an elector of that State who in case of a dispute shall have submitted to a certain test of ascertaining whether he is the genuine man the State has appointed or not? If it is not, then there is no value in the delegation to the Legislature of the State of the power to prescribe the manner in which this choice shall be made.

Can you say that above the State or behind it or somewhere there is still a Federal power to enter that State and say (in spite of the declaration of its constituted authorities that those persons and those only who have conformed to certain requisites of the law shall be the electors) that somebody else shall? The Legislature may say that they themselves will appoint the electors. Would it do for the counting power, wherever it may be, in such a case to say, "Well, this is a provision that is within the Constitution, as everybody knows it is, but we are satisfied that this particular Legislature acted under a mistake; they thought that these electors were going to vote for the other candidate for President, and we therefore will exercise the full power that belongs to a court of appeal or review to open the whole record and decide for ourselves what that Legislature intended to have done and ought to have done under the circumstances." That will not do, Mr. President. The two Houses have no power to say that. The form of the action of the State, its most solemn and authentic procedure, which the Constitution says shall be the act of the State, and then in the other clause that the act of the State shall be respected and its votes counted, you will have to change for a decision of Congress, or a Vice President, or a President of the Senate, or whatever committee or tribunal the law may select or determine upon as the true one to count the votes.

This fourth section, then, which provides for the conclusiveness of this State determination, is merely saying that the counting authority will recognize as the true act of the State, and give effect to it as such, that body of people that the State itself has finally through its own action determined to be the persons it has chosen. That is all. Can anything be more just if you are to respect the rights of the States under this clause of the Constitution? The very thing, without any law, without any provision, without any rule, that the two Houses meet to do, if it belongs to them to do it, or the very thing that the President of the Senate is to do if it belongs to him to do it, is to count and declare the result of the vote of the State; that is, to ascertain the will of the State, not according to his notion of what he thinks that will ought to have been, but according to his intellectual and judicial or administrative perception of the fact of what that State has done. Therefore this section simply provides that what this bill assumes to be, or confers as, the counting and declaring power shall respect and follow the choice of the State of her electors, and that the evidence of that choice shall be the action of the very machinery that the State itself has provided to determine whom she has chosen.

This action of the State, Mr. President, you will observe, is not an action of a sovereign and independent body in its original and natural right as a separate and independent body, as between foreign nations such acts of intercourse might take place, because without the Constitution of the United States there would be no such officer as President to be elected; without the Constitution of the United States there would be no such means of the selection of such an officer, if we had one, to be found. The duty of the State, and therefore its power, is one that did not pre-exist in itself, to elect a President for itself and for all the others of its sisters; but it is a right and a duty that is imposed upon it by the Federal Constitution, and the Federal Constitution has therefore measured and defined precisely the power that that State shall exert, and precisely the manner in which it shall be exerted. Then this law comes in under the Constitution to declare that when we have this authentic declaration of this exertion by the State of the power that the Constitution has reposed in it and the duty of exercising that power that it has imposed upon it, the national authority will respect the exercise of that power just as it is bound to respect the exercise of every other power the State may possess.

So it appeared to the committee that this provision that that body of men shall be taken to be the electors whom the State has appointed in the manner that the Legislature shall have determined that their appointment shall be ascertained, is an inherent part of the right which the State acquires under the Constitution to select its electors for itself and an inherent part of the duty that the Constitution has imposed upon the counting power, let it rest wherever it may, of recognizing and respecting this determination of the State as to the choice and identity of its electors. When you take the next step and have ascertained the body of persons who are to give their votes, then this clause of the Constitution has exhausted itself, the State has no further legal and legitimate concern in the way of control over the action of the electors. The duty and the power that is confided to the State is the duty of choosing a body of men and of choosing them finally, so that that choice shall have its effect in the final aggregate of the votes which are to be counted. That duty being done, then the electors so chosen and determined are officers, under the Constitution, of the United States, whose duties are pointed out by the Constitution, and of course it follows that they in the course of their conduct are subject to the Constitution and the constitutional laws of the United States and to nothing else.

There is a difference that will be immediately observed in respect of this power of the States, between this clause as to the choice of electors of President and Vice-President, and the clauses in relation to the election of Senators and Representatives. You will notice, sir, that in respect of Senators and Representatives, the same language is used, but the source of power to which it refers is quite a different one. It provides that each State in respect of the choice of members of Congress may determine the manner in which those elections shall be held; but it does not stop there as it does as to the electors of President. It adds that Congress may at any time take jurisdiction of that subject and provide by its own laws for the manner in which congressional elections shall be carried on, which of course involves the decision of every dispute that arises under them. In regard to the election of Senators, the Constitution declares that it is within the power of Congress to provide everything in respect of the manner of electing Senators to this body except the place for choosing them. In respect of the appointment of electors of President and Vice-President the Constitution confers no such power upon the Federal authority in any form, but it declares that the sole judge of the manner, the sole regulator of the manner, the sole provider of the means shall be the legislative authority of the State that the Constitution declares shall appoint its electors.

This bill, then, in this respect of which I am speaking, simply provides—you may measure and discuss it in what way you will—that the solemn and determinate voice of the State in the selection of the persons whom the Constitution says it shall select and whose votes shall be counted, shall be left where the Constitution leaves it, with the State, and that the counting authority shall respect that act of the State and not undertake upon any notions of its own to overturn it.

There is something still left; and I say this to those Senators who have sometimes appeared to suppose that if the two Houses of Congress, as this scheme is, have the counting power, the two Houses exercise revisory and judicial powers over whatever questions may legitimately arise. Suppose they do, what then is the true interpretation and the true effect of this bill? It only acts upon that revising and quasi-judicial power, if you call it such—and I assume it for the purpose of this aspect of the argument—in exactly the same way that from the foundation of the Government it has in all sorts of aspects acted upon the judicial power that the Constitution creates. That is to say, it regulates the mode of procedure, it defines the rules of evidence, and calls upon the court, if you call it a court, to respect the act and deed of the State which is authenticated in a certain way. That is all.

The Constitution says that the Supreme Court of the United States shall have jurisdiction of all cases that affect public embassadors. Now suppose the Congress of the United States immediately after the formation of the Government had decided that the only and conclusive evidence as to who is an embassador over whom that jurisdiction is to be exercised shall be an appointment of a sovereign under the great seal of state of the foreign country from which he purports to come, and that it should not be competent as a consequence for the Supreme Court to take up either upon public opinion or upon its own private notions, separate affidavits or what not, to prove the character of the person entitled to appeal to its jurisdiction or upon whom its jurisdiction might rightfully be exercised. Does anybody question that the court would have bowed in obedience to that law and said "it is within the legitimate province of the legislative power to provide laws by which this court is to be governed in ascertaining who are and what class are the persons who are entitled to its protection?" Nobody would question it. Other instances as to citizenship, as to the public character of officers, as to the authentication of records from the Departments fill your statutes with regulations that it shall be the duty of the judicial power to receive as authentic and give effect to them accordingly copies certified and formalized in a certain way; and when in some instances the courts have been appealed to to disregard these regulations of law and to say that it is a part of the judicial power to make its own regulations for the government of itself and that it is by Congress an invasion of the judicial power and a limitation of it to prescribe rules, the court with unanimous voice and for almost a century whenever the question has arisen has said "No, we cannot take that view of it, we cannot make regulations for the administration of the very powers that the Constitution has conferred upon us," not conferred by law, "against an act of Congress; but it falls within the legislative power to give effect to the jurisdiction that is imposed upon us and to regulate its administration," just as in all civilized nations it has always been regulated by the national statutes. So that if it were to be established (which I do not at all agree to, but I do not wish to go into that matter now) that the power of the two Houses recognized in this bill, or conferred by it, as the case may be, of exercising a certain canvassing scrutiny over these votes is a plenary and judicial power, there would still be the rightful jurisdiction of the legislative authority of the United States to declare that that jurisdiction and that plenary revising and canvassing power should be exercised in conformity with certain rules in order to give effect to what the Constitution declares to be the root and substance of the whole matter—the independent and untrammeled voice of the State selecting for itself and by its own instrumentalities the persons whom it has chosen and there is still left in that view of the case, as with the courts in the other cases I have referred to, the revising power of determining in the case that I have named, first, whether the Legislature of the given State has provided by law for a determination of the dispute; second, whether that dispute has been determined in conformity with the regulations and by the steps that that law prescribes; that is, whether the jurisdiction thus invoked has been followed. Then there only follows the consequence as in the other cases I have named, to illustrate—and I might spend a day in instances, enough certainly to convince the mind of any man, I think—there only follows the consequence that this court, (if you call it such,) of the two Houses, when it finds that the Legislature of the State has made this provision, when it finds that the provision has been followed, is bound upon the principles and declarations of this act, as it would be without it indeed, on the principles of law, to respect and to follow the determination of the State. I say, then, that we have not taken away the jurisdiction of the two Houses if it exists; we have not cramped it; we have only provided that in the exercise of that jurisdiction the test of what is the voice of the State shall be found in the declaration of the State itself. That is all.

I now come, sir, because I wish to be very brief and will take an opportunity hereafter, if it be necessary, to refer to authorities and decisions and precedents for what I have undertaken to uphold—I come to what this function is of counting the votes; and on that I do not wish to provoke a discussion, because it is apparently immaterial, with any gentleman who may differ with me. I know, as I believe I have said, that some have been, and no doubt now are, of the opinion that the function of counting and as involved in that of determining the identity and validity of a vote to a certain degree, is with the presiding officer of the Senate, whether he happens to be the Vice-President of the United States, or the President pro tempore of the body. That has been so thoroughly discussed hitherto, and so emphatically decided in an instance where it was largely according to the political wishes of a majority of this body at any rate—and that is the only body I am speaking to—to hold to the authority of the President of the Senate, that I do not think it necessary (certainly it is not on this occasion) to go into any discussion. The Senate held by a very large majority that no such power existed.

The next question would be whether this power resides in the two Houses, because the scope of this act in the other part of it is either to recognize the existence in the two Houses as two judges of election, so to speak, of the power to count and decide the necessary questions that are involved in that, and so regulates the exercise of that jurisdiction, or else it is a jurisdiction and an authority that the Constitution has not specifically lodged in any department of the Government but has only declared that it shall be exercised; and if that be the true construction of the Constitution, of course it follows that it is open to legislative provision and that Congress may confer upon the two Houses the administrative faculty, with all that it involves, of proceeding with this ceremony of the counting of the votes of the States and with the decision of all the questions that necessarily arise in every act, whether you call it an executive act, an administrative act, or a judicial act, because it is impossible as everybody knows to carry on a government for a day even in the simplest and the humblest of its executive functions, without recognizing by law in the simplest and humblest executive officer a certain amount of deciding power and a certain amount of responsibility. The judge of a court issues his warrant in conformity to law for the arrest of A B, and it is placed in the hands of the marshal. You say at first sight there is nothing for the marshal to decide, he is to arrest A B; but that very fact implies that the marshal must decide in executing that warrant between A B and the eight hundred million, or whatever it may be, in the world if his jurisdiction extended so far, or between A B and in the forty million if his jurisdiction extended over the United States, or the five million as it is in the State of New York, whether A B is one of that five million or whether some other man is the one that he is after. In other words, the marshal must decide for the time being the identity of the man whom he takes into his custody. He decides undoubtedly at his peril. So the President of the United States is authorized by the Constitution to do a great variety of executive acts in certain contingencies, and through his subordinate officers acting under his authority he proceeds to do those acts. In doing them the discretion of the executive power in the application of the law to the subject upon which it speaks must be exercised, judgment, discretion, will, choice. He exercises it at his peril; so do his subordinates where it is administrative. Where it is purely executive, if he makes a mistake the remedy of the citizen is clear and his redress perfect. If it is a matter where the Constitution or the law confides it to him as a judicial discretion, and he exercises it in an ill way rather than a good one, of course it is a perfectly legal fact, and it must stand; he is the sole judge, and your only case then is, if he does it corruptly, to impeach him.

Mr. President, I say this only to call your attention and that of the honorable Senators to the circumstance that whether you say this power is with the two Houses under the Constitution, or whether you say this bill providing for the exertion of it confers it as well, is of no consequence. If it is there, it is the subject of regulation; if it is not there, then it is within the competency of Congress, as everybody will agree, to provide for its being exercised by somebody, and in either case it is, as is the judicial power, to be exercised in conformity to the Constitution and in conformity to the regulations exerted in the spirit of the Constitution to carry the Constitution into effect.

The Constitution, then, saying that the State shall appoint its electors, and saying that that appointment, which means the creation of somebody whose vote is to be counted and nothing else, shall be in the manner that the Legislature shall direct, it is within the competence of Congress, as it appears to us, whether the power of counting be judicial, or wherever it may be lodged, or wherever it may be reposed, either by the Constitution or by the law, to declare that the counting tribunal, whatever it may be, shall obey the Constitution in respecting the act of the State done in conformity with it. It does not take away a deciding power, if one exists; it only regulates the means and the evidence which the court, if you call it a court, shall give effect to.

Of course, Mr. President, any person who believes that the two Houses of Congress do not under the Constitution possess any power at all to participate, except as witnesses, in the count of these votes, but that that power resides in the President of the Senate alone, would be obliged necessarily to vote against this bill irrespective of the effect that we give to the voice of the State, because it does provide for the action of the two Houses. He would not be obliged to vote against the fourth section of the bill, if it stood alone, framed to guide the exercise of the jurisdiction of the President of the Senate, because if it were with him, Congress could with equal propriety and with equal validity under the Constitution declare what should be the true authentication of the voice of the State which he should be bound to respect, that authentication being in the direction that the Constitution provides of expressing its voice in the manner that its Legislature directed. But apart from that, of course those who believe that the President of the Senate has this power of counting, be it much or little, as this bill is framed in all its aspects, could not vote for it; but to any gentleman who believes that the power resides in the two Houses, I respectfully submit that this bill does not in its fourth section—nobody claims that it does in any of the others—trench in the least upon the exercise of that power, but it provides regulations in the same manner and of the same nature that the recognized course of the history of this Government shows have always been provided for its judiciary, and which the very letter of the Constitution as to the appointment of electors and the manner of their appointment declares shall have effect, even if you had not any law, that the authentic voice of the State itself declaring who are her electors shall be recognized and respected.

I have now stated, Mr. President, about the sum and substance of the nature and scope of this bill. I have reason to suppose, from the previous votes of this body, that in respect of the chief part, perhaps every part of it except the fourth section, it would command, as the best thing possible under existing circumstances, the votes of a very large majority of this body. In the committee there were one or two of our brethren who were not able to see so clearly as the rest of us thought we did that this fourth section did not prescribe a coercive exercise of jurisdiction by the two Houses if they possessed it, and did not, therefore, in a certain way detract from the power that they thought the Constitution had given to the two Houses to go to the bottom of everything; but to the rest of us, and for the reasons I have stated, it appeared that it did not even in that aspect of the case.

The importance of this subject is so great, the time now in the middle of a presidential term is so opportune, before any excitement begins, before ambitions are stimulated and the heats of parties are revived, for a disposition of this subject, by exercising all the faculties that we possess under the Constitution as it is for the future, that I shall hope the Senate will enter into the consideration of this subject and dispose of it in some way by making such provisions as shall be consonant with the will of a majority of this body, before we set it aside and take up any other business whatever.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CONKLING. Unless the Senator from Alabama wishes to speak now, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to submit some remarks on this bill tomorrow.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I submit that motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at two o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 9, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] rises to a personal explanation.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the Clerk to read what I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would prefer to recognize the gentleman for this purpose after the morning hour. The practice heretofore has been to allow nothing to interfere with the business of the morning hour.

Mr. ATKINS. Very well.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twelve minutes past twelve o'clock. This being Monday, the first business during the morning hour is the call of States and Territories, beginning with the State of Maine, for bills and joint resolutions for introduction and reference to appropriate committees. During this call memorials and joint resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures are in order for reference.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] desires to make a personal explanation.

Mr. ATKINS. I send to the desk a copy of the New York Herald of December 6, 1878, and ask the Clerk to read the article which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, December 5, 1878.

THE HOT SPRINGS COMMISSION CLAUSE IN THE SUNDRY CIVIL SERVICE BILL—SENATOR CONOVER'S STATEMENT.

The Senate committee to investigate the charge that Senator CONOVER was implicated in the work of tampering with the sundry civil bill last summer, from which the Hot Springs commission clause was left out, will hardly be able to get to work until next week, as some of the members appointed by Mr. WHEELER show a disinclination to serve. Senator CONOVER, in his defense, says he will show that the bill was not fully compared by the Enrolling Committee and that there is no evidence extant that the bill was completed and perfected when it left the House side of the Capitol to go over to the President. It will be remembered that in the excitement and dissipation of the closing hours of the session Mr. RAINEY, the colored member from South Carolina, was the only representative of the Enrolling Committee who stood at his post. Now Senator CONOVER intends to show by the evidence of Mr. RAINEY and Mr. King, his clerk, that the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Mr. ATKINS, came to him while he was engaged in comparing the sundry civil bill, and when he was within twenty pages of completing it, and insisted that he [Mr. RAINEY] should desist and give up the bill and report it to the House, that it was all right as it was, and that it wouldn't do to prolong the session any further by waiting to complete the comparison; that Mr. RAINEY, in obedience to his sworn duty as a Congressman and member of the committee, protested against reporting or turning in the bill until it was thoroughly revised by him, and that he was responsible for its proper preparation; that thereupon Mr. ATKINS renewed his entreaty and gathered up and took away the bill in its unfinished state, and that the Hot Springs provision was contained in the last twenty pages, which, had Mr. RAINEY been allowed to do his duty, would have duly contained and expressed the will of Congress.

It will be remembered that Mr. ATKINS asked the Treasury Department to put a secret service agent to work to detect the reason of the flaw in the bill, and that the agent selected implicated Senator CONOVER by suspicion and circumstantial evidence. The above is the rejoinder of Senator CONOVER to the action of Mr. ATKINS. The report of this agent is still kept a secret from the House and the press, but will be handed over by Mr. ATKINS to the Senate investigating committee when the latter organizes for business. Its contents have been generally discounted through the leaking or gossiping of the Treasury detectives.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have ever risen to a question of personal privilege throughout a somewhat lengthy public service. The gravamen of the article just read is that, in my anxiety to have the sundry civil bill returned to the House for the Speaker's signature, I "gathered up and took the bill away in its unfinished state;" in this manner the missing clause may have been lost. In answer to that charge I ask the Clerk to read the letters of Messrs. King and Jenness, the enrolling and assistant enrolling clerks, and also the letter of Mr. RAINEY, the member of the Committee on Enrolled Bills, who compared the bill.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 7, 1878.

SIR: In reply to your inquiry as to whether I saw the sundry civil appropriation bill in your possession, I will say: that I never saw the bill in your possession the night of the adjournment after it was enrolled nor during the course of its comparison after its enrollment, and the statement which appears in the New York Herald that you took the bill and by so doing prevented its proper comparison is not true.

Very respectfully,

THOMAS F. KING.

Hon. J. D. C. ATKINS.

I was present all night during the comparison of sundry civil bill, and concur in the foregoing statements of Mr. King.

G. H. JENNESS,
Assistant Enrolling Clerk.

During the comparison of the sundry civil bill I had entire control of the same. At no time did it pass out of my hands into yours, or any one else's until signed by the Speaker, the statement in the New York Herald of the 6th instant to the contrary notwithstanding.

J. H. RAINEY,
Of Committee on Enrolled Bills.

Mr. ATKINS. It will be seen that these gentlemen positively contradict the statement in the Herald correspondence. Additional testimony of officers and members of this House to the same effect could be adduced if necessary. The charge that I touched the bill or any part of it is absolutely untrue. I have endeavored to find out the authorship of this article, but have only been able to trace it to impersonal and irresponsible sources.

As the writer of the article, both in the beginning and conclusion of it, purports to foreshadow what will be the defense of Senator S. B. CONOVER, and proposes to represent that gentleman, I therefore addressed a letter to him inquiring his connection with the misrepresentation that it was through my alleged handling of the bill that the clause was lost. I ask the Clerk to read my letter and the reply.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hon. S. B. CONOVER:

I invite your attention to a letter which appeared in the New York Herald of the 6th instant, purporting to foreshadow some of the grounds of your "defense" in the investigation now pending relative to the Hot Springs commission clause in the last sundry civil appropriation bill, which failed to become a law. In this article this language occurs: "and thereupon Mr. ATKINS renewed his entreaty, and gathered up and took away the bill in its unfinished state." * * * As the beginning and the conclusion of the article in the Herald refers to this charge against me, to wit, that I "gathered up and took the bill away in its unfinished state," as the ground of your defense, I write you this note to inquire whether you suggested or authorized any such statement either to the Herald correspondent or to any one else.

Respectfully,

J. D. C. ATKINS.

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, December 8, 1878.

SIR: I am in receipt of your note of this date, in which you desire to be informed whether or not I "suggested or authorized any such statement as appears in the New York Herald of the 6th instant, either to the Herald correspondent or to any one else," in relation to a missing clause of the sundry civil bill.

In reply I would state that the article referred to does me injustice as well as yourself. It is a mistake. Your name has never been mentioned by me in connection with the "Hot Springs bill" except as to the fact that the report of the "Secret Service Bureau" was transmitted to you officially.

Respectfully,

S. B. CONOVER.

Hon. J. D. C. ATKINS.

Mr. ATKINS. The House will observe that Mr. CONOVER flatly and positively contradicts the statement of the Herald correspondent, who professed to anticipate his defense upon what authority I know not.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. Several gentlemen desire to present House resolutions for reference, and the Chair asks consent to recognize such requests as they are not embraced strictly within the rule of the morning hour.

Mr. GARFIELD. For reference only?

The SPEAKER. Only for reference.

Mr. CONGER. Subject to objection, I suppose?

The SPEAKER. The Chair presumes they are subject to objection.

CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS IN STATE COURTS.

Mr. CABELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending section 641 and the succeeding sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States as that no criminal prosecution commenced in any State court for any cause whatsoever shall be removed from such State court into any circuit court of the United States for the trial thereof, and to repeal all acts and parts of acts providing for the same.

SILVER DOLLARS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I offer the preamble and resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Secretary of the Treasury has informed this House, in his annual report of December 2, 1878, that "a satisfactory arrangement has been made by which all drafts on the banks held by the Treasury are to be paid at the clearing-house, (meaning the New York Clearing-House Association,) and all drafts on the Treasury held by them are to be paid to the clearing-house at the office of the assistant treasurer in United States notes;" and

Whereas said clearing-house association, composed of forty-five national banks and thirteen State banks, has adopted, among other rules for the government of the banks in said association, for the transaction of business after the 1st day of January, 1879, a rule prohibiting payment of balances at the clearing-house in silver dollars, except as subsidiary coin in small sums, (say under $10;) and

Whereas such a rule is in violation of the law which has made silver dollars of 412½ grains of standard silver a full legal tender for all public or private debts, and is an unlawful conspiracy to nullify a law of the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to inform this House whether the Treasury Department has acquiesced in and is to be governed by said rule in its settlements with the banks of said association.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask for action on the resolution at this time. It is an inquiry addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, and I presume there will be no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the adoption of the preamble and resolution?

Mr. HALE. I think they had better be referred.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I should like action to be taken upon them at this time, because the resolution is simply an inquiry addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. If referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency the committee when on call can report it back to the House, if in their judgment they deem it proper to do so.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Very well.

The preamble and resolution were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, also, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Whereas the New York Clearing-House Association, composed of forty-five national banks and other banking associations, has adopted, among other rules for the government of the banks in said association, for the transaction of business after the 1st day of January, 1879, a rule prohibiting payment of balances at the clearing-house in silver dollars, except as subsidiary coin, in small sums, (say under $10;) and

Whereas such a rule is in violation of the law which has made silver dollars of 412½ grains of standard silver a legal tender for all public or private debts, and is an unlawful conspiracy to nullify a law of the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary is hereby instructed to advise this House whether, under the present law, said national banks have by such conspiracy forfeited their charters, or whether further legislation is necessary to revoke the charter of any national-banking association which has or may enter into such a conspiracy, or which may refuse to receive said silver dollars as legal tenders.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE. It is understood that these resolutions are not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. They will not be, having been introduced and referred by unanimous consent. In the judgment of the Chair there seems to be a deficiency in the rules in regard to the introduction of simple House resolutions. The rule provides that if the call for bills and joint resolutions for reference on Monday shall be concluded before the expiration of a morning hour, the remainder of the hour shall be devoted to the introduction of House resolutions. The morning hour of Monday is almost invariably exhausted either because of the number of bills introduced, or by a resort to the reading of bills with the intention of exhausting the hour, and the result is that members have seldom an opportunity to offer House resolutions. It was for that reason that the Chair made the request this morning.

CONDITION OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. SAYLER. I ask consent to submit the preamble and resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas public interests and a just regard for the rights of the people demand that their Representatives in Congress should be informed as to the exact condition of the Treasury, so as to enable them to enact such legislation as will promote the general good, especially at this time when the experiment of resumption of specie payments is about to begin, through which violent fluctuations in the value of property and serious embarrassments in the payment of debts may occur unless resumption can be permanently maintained, after it has begun, and made equal in its operations in all sections and to all classes: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, instructed to report to this body within five days from the passage of this resolution—

First. The exact amount of actual gold coin and gold bullion and silver coin and silver bullion, respectively, received into the Treasury between January 31 and October 1, 1878.

Second. The exact amount of each, respectively, received in payment for customs dues, for 4 per cent. bonds, and from all other sources, each in detail, between said dates.

Third. The exact amount of each, respectively, paid out for interest on the public debt, for called bonds, for circulation, and for all other purposes, each in detail between said dates.

Fourth. The exact amount of all subscriptions for 4 per cent. bonds, redeemed fractional currency, legal-tender and national-bank notes, clearing-house or other certificates, contracts, securities, or agreements entered on the books of the Department, or otherwise counted as a part of the coin balance in the Treasury, each in detail, between said dates.

Fifth. The exact increase to the principal of the interest-bearing debt of the Government, with the kind of payment actually received for the same, in detail, between said dates.

Sixth. The exact amount of actual gold coin and gold bullion and silver coin and silver bullion, respectively, in the Treasury owned by the Government, and where it was located on the 1st day of December, 1878.

Seventh. The exact amount of coin coupons, demand notes, coin certificates in the Treasury, coin certificates outstanding, amount set apart for the sinking fund and its interest; bonds redeemed, with their interest; called bonds on which interest has ceased, with their interest; called bonds on which interest had not ceased; interest due and unpaid, accrued interest on the public debt due to individuals or trusts for bullion deposited for which no certificates had been issued, with the amount and kind of all other notes, bonds, or obligations payable in coin, except the principal of the national debt, as they appeared on the books of the Department or otherwise on the 1st day of December, 1878, with the exact amount of actual gold and silver coin owned by the Government after deducting the aggregate of such sums and its per cent. to the total amount of legal-tender and national-bank notes in circulation on said date.

Mr. GARFIELD. It would require all the force in the Treasury for two months to answer that resolution.

Mr. HALE. Let it be referred.

Mr. SAYLER. That is what I desire, to have it referred.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object.

Mr. SAYLER. I understood that unanimous consent was given for members to offer resolutions for reference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, for at the very time the Chair asked for consent he heard members on the left interpose a reservation.

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman from Ohio will add an appropriation of $25,000 to carry out the resolution I will not object.

Mr. SAYLER. The country, then, is not to be informed in regard to the condition of the Treasury.

TENNESSEE CLAIMS FOR KEEPING PRISONERS.

Mr. HOUSE. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 882, to authorize the proper accounting officer of the Treasury to audit and pay the claim of the State of Tennessee for keeping United States military prisoners, be now taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Claims.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. BURCHARD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That when the House adjourns on Saturday, the 21st instant, it stands adjourned until Monday, January 6, 1879.

TIMBER DEPREDATIONS.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask leave to offer a resolution calling for information, to be acted on at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is confined to a call for resolutions for reference.

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to have it put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, and if no one objects it will be put upon its passage.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the House of Representatives with an account of all moneys expended by the Department of Justice in prosecutions for timber depredations in the State of Mississippi, and that he furnish the House with the number of suits instituted, number dismissed, number successfully prosecuted, and number of cases still pending, and with the accounts of the marshal of the southern district of Mississippi in each and every of said suits, and that he give a detailed statement of accounts presented by said marshal to his Department, whether the same have been paid and allowed or not; and that he also furnish to this House a statement of all contracts and with amounts paid or agreed to be paid to any and all attorneys employed in aid of the regular attorney of the Government.

Mr. CONGER. I object to that resolution.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a point of order. When I offered this resolution the other day a single objection, then made by the same gentleman who now objects, carried it over, because I was then asking leave to offer it by unanimous consent. I now propose to offer the resolution as one which may be offered on Monday. I would ask the Speaker the parliamentary question whether I am not in order in offering this resolution and asking for its adoption at this time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. A few moments ago the Chair stated to the House that in his judgment there was a deficiency in the rules in regard to the offering of House resolutions. The rule now provides that after the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees in the morning hour of Monday shall have been concluded, if any of the hour be left then House resolutions may be offered. The practical result, however, is that seldom if ever is an opportunity given for offering House resolutions during the morning hour of Monday.

Mr. HOOKER. I will ask whether the morning hour has not expired?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will add that under Rule 52, to which the Chair desires to refer the gentleman from Mississippi, there is another mode provided for the offering of House resolutions after the committees are called for reports, but conflicting rules and higher privileges almost always prevent such opportunity.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Has not the gentleman from Mississippi or any other member on this floor the right to move to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] as first on the list to move to suspend the rules, if objection is made to the course now being proceeded with by unanimous consent.

Mr. DURHAM. I move to suspend the rules and put on its passage the bill which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. As a number of gentlemen desired to bring before the House matters of personal interest to themselves to which there would probably be no objection the Chair was anxious to afford them that opportunity. But if objection is made, the Chair must adhere to the order of business as established by the rules. Before the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky is entertained, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD] desires to give some notice.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I desire to give notice that I will call up for consideration—immediately on the assembling of Congress after the holiday vacation—a bill to amend sundry provisions of chapter 1, title 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to presidential elections, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DURHAM. I now renew my motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill which I have sent to the desk.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to inquire whether at this session the practice will conform to the same rule which was adopted at the last session in regard to awarding members the floor for motions to suspend the rules according to the list in the possession of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. Substantially the same practice will be followed; but the Chair will endeavor so to adjust recognitions between the two sides of the House that there shall be exact fairness in this respect as to motions to suspend the rules on Monday. At the last session, there was some dissatisfaction in reference to this matter, which the Chair desires to avoid at the present session if possible.

Mr. CONGER. I simply wish to know what the rule will be at this session.

The SPEAKER. The practice, so far as the Chair may be able to execute it, will be to recognize first a gentleman on one side of the House and then a gentleman on the other, following in other respects the order in which gentlemen stand on the list.

Mr. CONGER. The old list?

The SPEAKER. No, sir; the new list. There is quite a large new list. The Chair is anxious to have both sides satisfied in reference to these recognitions on Monday.

Mr. CONGER. Then, what is the position of gentlemen whose names were on the old list and who were not reached?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the old list expired with the adjournment of the last session. The Chair will endeavor to see that no disadvantage shall be suffered by either side.

Mr. CONGER. It would have been pleasant to us if we had known that the old list was to be discarded, so that we might have renewed our applications for recognition.

The SPEAKER. They have been renewed in many instances.

Mr. CONGER. Then, only those who had notice can have renewed their applications.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has given no notice on this subject until now.

Mr. DURHAM. I will say to the gentleman that I had received no notice at all when I had my name put down.

The SPEAKER. These requests for recognition upon motions to suspend the rules seem to have been filed at the desk without consulting or advising with the Speaker. The Chair, as he has already stated, intends to depart from the order of this list so far as to allow each side of the House an equal number of recognitions.

Mr. CONGER. I would suggest whether it would not be proper to follow the old list until all the gentlemen named on it have had their opportunity, and then to adopt the new list.

The SPEAKER. If the House should so express its pleasure, the Chair would conform to it.

Mr. CONGER. That course would seem to be just to those gentlemen who were as dilligent as they could have been at the last session, and who had their names on the list at that time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] ever suffered in this House from any want of diligence on his part. [Laughter.] He has been unusually diligent; and the Chair speaks with entire sincerity and truth when he says so.

Mr. CONGER. I do not call in question the sincerity of the Chair on this occasion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman shall suffer no disadvantage if the Chair can prevent it.

TRADE-DOLLAR.

Mr. DURHAM. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to provide for the exchange and recoinage of the trade-dollar and to cease the further coinage of the trade-dollar.

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be no further coinage of the trade-dollar, and that the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be exchanged at the Treasury and the various subtreasuries of the United States legal-tender silver dollars at par, and shall recoin said trade-dollars into legal-tender dollars of 412½ grains of standard silver as now provided by law.

Mr. DWIGHT. I desire to object to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to suspend the rules under which the gentleman would not have the right to object.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I would like to inquire whether after the question is taken on the motion to suspend the rules there will be opportunity to offer amendments to the bill?

The SPEAKER. There will not be. The motion is to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I think the bill ought to be amended.

Mr. EDEN. I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman who has presented this bill.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. STONE, of Michigan. I ask that the bill be again read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill will be again read. It relates to an important subject, and the Chair thinks it ought to be thoroughly understood.

The bill was again read.

Mr. DURHAM. There is an omission of some words there which I ask leave to supply.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will step to the Clerk's desk and make the correction he desires.

Mr. WOOD. Is it in order to ask a question as to the meaning of a certain portion of this resolution?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky what he proposes to do with the trade-dollars now in circulation under his resolution? [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. As there has been a word added to the bill the Chair thinks it essential it should be again read as modified, because the insertion of a word may alter the effect of the bill entirely.

The Clerk read the bill as modified, as follows:

That there shall be no further coinage of the trade-dollar, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be exchanged at the Treasury and the various subtreasuries of the United States legal-tender silver dollars at par for trade-dollars, and shall recoin said trade-dollars into legal-tender dollars of 412½ grains of standard silver as now provided by law.

Mr. EDEN. Let me ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether that will increase the amount of coinage over and above what is now provided by law? [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. There is objection to debate and it cannot be had without unanimous consent.

Mr. DURHAM demanded the yeas and nays under a suspension of the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 153, nays 92, not voting 46; as follows:

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. My colleague, Mr. PRIDEMORE, is detained at home by the illness of his wife.

Mr. DEERING. I wish to state that Mr. BANKS, of Massachusetts, is paired with Mr. BLAND, of Missouri.

Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania. My colleague, Mr. WARD, who is absent on important business, is paired with Mr. AIKEN, of South Carolina.

Mr. REAGAN. I have been requested by my colleague, Mr. THROCKMORTON, to state that he is confined to his room by illness.

Mr. STRAIT. My colleague, Mr. DUNNELL, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. BLAND. I ask that my vote be withdrawn, having inadvertently voted, as I am paired with Mr. BANKS. If he were here, I would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. STEWART. I am paired with Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. If he were present, I would vote in the negative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the passage of a bill (S. No. 1038) for the relief of Jesse Turner and others, sureties upon the official bond of George W. Clarke, formerly Indian agent; in which concurrence was requested.

It further announced the passage of a resolution for the appointment of a committee to investigate and report the best means to prevent the introduction and spread of epidemic diseases, especially yellow fever and cholera, within the limits of the United States, and that it had appointed Mr. HARRIS, Mr. MATTHEWS, Mr. LAMAR, Mr. PADDOCK, Mr. CONOVER, Mr. GARLAND, and Mr. EUSTIS as the members of said committee.

It further announced its disagreement to the resolution of the House for the appointment of a joint committee to inquire into the recent history and means of prevention and arrest of yellow fever and other epidemic diseases.

LEGAL-TENDER QUALITY OF SILVER DOLLARS.

Mr. FORT. I move that the rules be suspended and that the resolution which I send to the desk be adopted.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the legal-tender quality of silver dollars of 412½ grains of standard silver shall be maintained and enforced, and that any discrimination against said silver dollars by any national banking association by refusing to receive them and treat them as legal dollars shall be deemed a defiance of the laws of the United States, and the Committee on Banking and Currency is hereby instructed to mature and bring in a bill to provide for the withdrawal of the circulating notes of all such banks so offending.

Mr. CHITTENDEN and other members called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask that the resolution be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. An amendment is not in order.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 151, nays 90, not voting 50; as follows:

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. FRYE. I am paired with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. KNOTT, who is confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. STEWART. I am paired with Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida.

Mr. POWERS. I am paired with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. CARLISLE. If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. AIKEN. I am paired with Mr. WARD, of Pennsylvania. If he were present, I should vote "ay."

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My colleague, Mr. KNAPP, is prevented from being present by illness.

Mr. HART. My colleague from New York, Mr. LOCKWOOD, is paired with Mr. PUGH, of New Jersey, on this question.

Mr. BELL. My colleague from Georgia, Mr. STEPHENS, is detained at his room by indisposition.

Mr. YOUNG. I am paired with Mr. LORING, of Massachusetts.

Mr. BLAND. I am paired with Mr. BANKS, of Massachusetts. If he were present, I would vote "ay."

Mr. STONE, of Iowa. I am paired with Mr. COOK, of Georgia.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

CORRUPTION IN ELECTIONS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] has been recognized.

Mr. CHALMERS. I move that the rules be suspended and that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5257) to prevent corruption in elections, and that the bill be passed.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, but the motion to adjourn is in order, if pressed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That no officer, agent, or contractor, or other person holding any office or employment of profit or trust under the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, shall, by the contribution of money or other valuable thing, or by the use or abuse of any official privilege or function, or by threat and menaces, or in any other manner, intermeddle with the election of any member or members of either House of Congress or of the President or Vice-President of the United States of America; and every such officer or other person offending therein shall be held guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof shall be removed from such office or employment, and fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000; and that all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That any person who shall, by solicitation or otherwise, attempt to induce any officer or person holding an employment of profit or trust under the United States to contribute money or any valuable thing, to be used for election purposes in any election enumerated in this act, shall be held guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] to insist on his motion. The gentleman from Mississippi is advised that the bill which has just been read will be the first business in order next Monday after the morning hour.

Mr. CHALMERS. Very well.

FEES OF DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR OFFICERS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks unanimous consent to present certain executive communications which it is important should be referred.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting a statement of such fees as have been collected, accounted for, and reported by the various diplomatic and consular officers of the United States for the year ended December 31, 1877; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

FRESH-BEEF ISSUES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting copies of contracts for fresh-beef issues to troops; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

MILITARY PRISON AT FORT LEAVENWORTH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting recommendations in regard to the military prison at Fort Leavenworth; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ASSESSMENTS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, relative to the collection of certain assessments in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

LIEUTENANT R. K. BAILEY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a list of articles lost by Lieutenant R. K. Bailey on steamer Don Cameron; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DUTIES ON SUGAR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting draft of a bill to regulate duties on certain classes of sugars, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a statement showing the number of public documents received by that Department for distribution on behalf of the Government during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1878; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting estimates of receipts and expenditures of the District of Columbia for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1879, and June 30, 1880; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

JOHN B. BATCHELDER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the secretary of the Society of the Army of the Potomac, transmitting a copy of resolutions adopted by said society recommending the employment of John B. Batchelder; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

POSTAL RAILWAY CARS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, relative to the discontinuance of the postal railway cars; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

THE LATE JOSEPH HENRY.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask unanimous consent to submit for adoption at this time a concurrent resolution, to which I think there will be no objection.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That the Congress of the United States will take part in the services to be observed on Thursday evening, January 16, 1879, in honor of the memory of Joseph Henry, late secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, under the auspices of the Regents thereof, and for that purpose the Senators and Representatives will assemble on that evening in the Hall of the House of Representatives, the Vice-President, supported by the Speaker of the House, to preside on that occasion.

There being no objection, the resolution was adopted.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That Edward Clarke, architect of the Capitol, who is charged with the duty of heating and ventilating the same, be admitted to the floor of the Hall of the House of Representatives during the sessions of Congress.

EPIDEMIC DISEASES.

Mr. YOUNG. I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration and adoption at this time the preamble and resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the epidemic which has recently prevailed in large districts of several States of the Union has been so destructive of human life and its interests and the prosperity of the whole country as to make it the subject of gravest public concern, and its prevention in future an important duty, to the end that its return may be prevented so far as the same can be done by decided action and prompt legislation: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That a select committee of nine Representatives be appointed by the Speaker of the House, who shall, in connection with a like committee already created by resolution of the Senate, investigate and report the best method of preventing the introduction and spread of epidemic diseases, especially of yellow fever and cholera, within the limits of the United States; that said committee shall be allowed a clerk and, if in the course of its investigation it is found necessary, a stenographer; and may have power to send for persons and papers and employ experts and scientists, not exceeding seven in number, and may send them to, and visit by subcommittees, recently infected localities and other places for the purpose of obtaining the fullest and most accurate information in reference to the origin, introduction, and prevention of said epidemic diseases; and should the work of said committee and scientists not be completed before the expiration of the present session of Congress, they may sit during vacation, and also have power to report by bill or otherwise at any time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] that the House has not power by a simple resolution to authorize one of its committees to sit after the sine die adjournment of Congress.

Mr. YOUNG. I think there is a rule of the House which authorizes that to be done by special resolution. I cannot call the attention of the Speaker to the rule just at this time, but I examined it the other day.

The SPEAKER. It might possibly be done by law, but not by a resolution of the House. The rule to which the gentleman refers, the Chair thinks, is not comprehensive enough to accomplish the object of the gentleman.

Mr. YOUNG. I think the Chair is probably correct, and I will strike out that portion of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. If it shall be found necessary hereafter, then a law can be passed upon the subject.

The resolution, as modified, was then adopted.

MESSENGER FOR COMMITTEES.

Mr. VANCE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee of Accounts:

Resolved, That the Committee on Patents and the Committee on Railways and Canals be, and they are hereby, authorized to jointly employ a messenger for the present session of Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, at the same rate of compensation as is now allowed to messengers appointed by the Doorkeeper.

HEADQUARTERS OF DISTRICT POLICE.

Mr. LANDERS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be, and they hereby are, requested to communicate to this House an estimate of the expense required to remodel and repair the old central guard-house, on Louisiana avenue between Ninth and Tenth streets, so that it can be used for police station-house purposes or as a police headquarters; and that the present building used for police headquarters be occupied until this House takes some action in the matter.

MODIFICATION OF A BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BROGDEN,] who introduced this morning a bill with reference to a court-house, desires consent to strike out a single word before the bill is printed. If there be no objection leave to make the change will be granted.

There was no objection.

TREASURER'S REPORT.

Mr. ATKINS. I have before me a copy of the report of the Treasurer of the United States for the present fiscal year, rendered to and adjusted by the Sixth Auditor. It was referred the other day to the Committee on Appropriations. I desire to report it back and move its reference to the Committee of Ways and Means.

There being no objection, the reference of the document was changed accordingly.

GREENLEAF CILLEY.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 1305) for the relief of Greenleaf Cilley be taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WARD for one week, on account of important business.

ADMINISTRATORS OF E. L. ALLEN.

Mr. BRIGHT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5476) for the relief of M. D. Hampton and C. S. Wilson, administrators of E. L. Allen, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BLOUNT, that the House adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at three o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 10, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

GEORGE E. SPENCER, a Senator from the State of Alabama, appeared in his seat to-day.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message of the President of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 27th of May last, calling for information in relation to the claims of John G. Kendrick and other citizens of the United States against the government of Nicaragua for personal injuries October 19, 1855, at Virgin Bay, in the territory of Nicaragua, alleged to have been inflicted by soldiers acting under the authority or by the permission of that government, a report from the Secretary of State, together with copies of papers therein referred to; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting information on the subject of the loss of baggage by the sinking of the steamer J. Don Cameron in May, 1877; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MAXEY presented the petition of the Baptist General Association of the State of Texas, praying that the Wichitas and other tribes of Indians at the Wichita agency may have lands for houses set apart within the reservation for the use of the several families within each tribe; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of William Collins, of Waldo, Maine, praying payment of certain moneys alleged to be due him as bounty for services of the schooner Sarah Franklin, employed in the fisheries in the year 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BECK. I am requested by one of the Representatives from California to present the petition of Henry C. De Ahna, late collector of customs for the district of Alaska, praying compensation for services rendered. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOOTH presented the memorial of John G. Downey and others, citizens of California, remonstrating against the adoption of a proposed commercial treaty between France and the United States affecting the present rates of duty upon imported wines and brandies; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of J. C. Johnson & Co. and other business firms of San Francisco, praying to be compensated out of the Geneva award for losses incurred by them in the payment of war premiums during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PADDOCK presented the petition of Henry H. Clark and others, citizens of Nebraska, praying for the establishment of a mail-route from Kearney, Buffalo County, to Lena, Custer County, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. HOAR presented four petitions of citizens of Massachusetts, praying the passage of a law providing that pensions shall commence from the date of the death or discharge of the soldiers to whom granted; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 833) for the relief of James E. Macklin, lieutenant Eleventh Infantry, United States Army, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 457) to provide for the settlement of accounts with certain railway companies, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPENCER. I am also directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1435) authorizing the appointment of Dr. Junius L. Powell an assistant surgeon in the United States Army, to report it with an amendment, and to ask the passage of the bill as amended. As this is purely a personal bill and will not take any time, I should like to have the present consideration of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama will wait until the business of the Calendar is called, and then the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. BURNSIDE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 409) for the relief of James Clift, late captain Fifth Tennessee Cavalry, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. KERNAN (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1469) to authorize the issue of certain duplicate registered bonds to the Manhattan Savings Institution; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LAMAR (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1461) to promote the education of the blind; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1462) to establish a department of public health; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the select committee to investigate and report on the best means of preventing the introduction and spread of epidemic diseases.

Mr. WALLACE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1463) to authorize the exchange of subsidiary coin for trade-dollars; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1464) granting the right of way to the Florida International Ship-Canal Company and to build and operate a telegraph line along said canal; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. VOORHEES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1465) granting a pension to Theodore Halberstadt; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAMLIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1467) to amend the fifth and sixth sections of the act entitled "An act establishing post-routes, and for other purposes;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BOOTH (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1468) to confer on the United States Court of Claims jurisdiction over certain Alabama claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1469) for the relief of W. P. Moran; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOWE (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1470) for the relief of Sewell B. Corbett; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1471) for the relief of Dabny Walker; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WHYTE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1472) granting a pension to Elizabeth T. Winder; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1473) granting a pension to Sally Murray Buchanan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALLISON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1474) granting a pension to John G. Eckles; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLUMB asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 44) instructing the Attorney-General of the United States to bring certain suits in the name of the United States to set aside certain patents to lands of the Black Bob band of Shawnee Indians; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT TO THE POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 5218) to establish post-routes in the several States herein named; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

TESTIMONY OF JAMES E. ANDERSON.

Mr. ALLISON, from the select committee to inquire into certain matters touching the late presidential election in Louisiana, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives be respectfully requested to transmit to the Senate a copy of the testimony of one James E. Anderson relating to Hon. STANLEY MATTHEWS, a member of the Senate from the State of Ohio, understood to have been taken before one of the committees of the House of Representatives.

REPORTS OF MAJOR JOHN M. WILSON.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish the Senate with copies of the reports of Major John M. Wilson, of the United States Engineer Corps, made in pursuance of the act of June, 1878, authorizing surveys to be made of the ports of Foulweather, Port Orford, Coos Bay, Alsea, and of Coquille River, Oregon.

OMISSION IN ENROLLMENT.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the select committee relative to an error in the enrollment of the sundry civil appropriation bill at the last session of Congress, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the special committee appointed under resolution of the Senate of December 3, introduced by Senator CONOVER, be empowered to employ a stenographer and have the testimony taken by the committee printed from day to day as the same is taken.

DR. JUNIUS L. POWELL.

Mr. SPENCER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1435) authorizing the appointment of Dr. Junius L. Powell an assistant surgeon in the United States Army, being the bill which I just now reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the President of the United States to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, Dr. Junius L. Powell an assistant surgeon in the United States Army, with the rank of first lieutenant, to date from June 6, 1878; and relieves him from the disabilities imposed by the twenty-eighth section of the act entitled "An act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States," approved July 28, 1866.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 9, to strike out the words "disabilities imposed by" and insert the words "operation of."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the bill again read for information, as it is short.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I should like to hear the Senator reporting the bill tell us exactly what it means and what is the necessity for this proposed legislation.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, Dr. Powell has been for some time acting as assistant surgeon in the United States Army. His confirmation is now pending before the Senate. He cannot be confirmed because at a very early age he served in the confederate army. The only object of the bill is to remove that disability, if you call it a disability. At a very young age he was a confederate soldier, and there is an act of Congress which prevents any one who served in the confederate army from accepting a commission in the Army of the United States. The Committee on Military Affairs, after an examination of this case, have reported the bill unanimously. That is all there is in it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The bill involves a very important principle, if I may say so without offending anybody's sensibilities just now. The statutes of the United States, passed either during the rebellion or soon after its close, provided that the Army should not be filled up by persons who had engaged in the rebellion; and, so far as I know, this is the first instance in which it has been proposed to change that law. If this case stands upon some special circumstances which would make it clearly distinguishable from other cases of that character, which of course may be innumerable, then those circumstances of distinction ought to be clearly stated. If there are no such circumstances of distinction, then it appears to me that it is obviously just not to make a piece of special and personal legislation of this matter, but to repeal the statute which prohibits the enlistment and appointment of that class of citizens in the Army, so that there will be fair play and equal rights as to all. Inasmuch, therefore, as the bill involves merely the propriety of continuing that law upon the statute-book, as the case is now stated, I should hope that it would go over until we may have time to consider and see exactly what the law is, and what are the principles upon which it rests, if there are any—(there were thought to be some I suppose at the time it was passed,)—and whether it ought to be repealed. We certainly ought not to make fish of one and flesh of another in respect of that class of our fellow-citizens whom this bill affects as to one of them and whom the general law affects as to others. I move, therefore, that the consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. SPENCER. Before that is done I should like to have read a communication from General Sherman and several other officers of the Army who strongly recommend the treatment of this as an exceptional case; and it was upon their recommendation that the report was made. The Secretary will read the communication accompanying the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reading of the communication is called for, and it will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS SECOND UNITED STATES ARTILLERY,
Fort McHenry, Baltimore, June 16, 1878.

To the Chairman Military Committee, United States Senate:

SIR: I would respectfully ask your special attention to, and favorable action upon, the case of Dr. J. L. Powell, whose nomination for the appointment of assistant surgeon United States Army is now before your committee.

Dr. Powell has been an acting assistant surgeon in the Army for the past four years. As such he made two arduous campaigns against the Kiowa and Comanche Indians, for which he received notices of commendation from Generals Miles and Mackenzie, under whose immediate command he served. Dr. Powell also made the campaign (Powder River) of General Crook against the Sioux, being the senior medical officer of the Fifth Regiment United States Cavalry, during which he performed dangerous and very arduous duty. He served under my command two years ago, and is now again serving under my command at this post, and has made for himself a deserved reputation for professional knowledge and skill, for subordinate and zealous soldiership, and for loyal and patriotic citizenship.

If I am correctly informed, Dr. Powell's trouble before your committee arises from certain services rendered by him in the military force of the confederacy during the rebellion. I do not know what the extent of that service was; but as he was a minor during the whole of that period, it would not seem that he is or ought to be now legally disqualified for appointment in the military service of the United States. Certainly the four years of valuable and loyal service which he has rendered in the United States Army since the rebellion, should entitle him to the most favorable construction of the law and of the past and present rulings of your committee.

I beg, again, to ask of you and of the Military Committee favorable action in this case.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM F. BARRY,
Colonel Second Artillery, Brevet Major-General United States Army.

[Indorsement.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 17, 1878.

GENERAL SPENCER, Chairman Military Committee, Senate:

Please read this and hear the bearer, Dr. Powell. He is well known to us, and is highly esteemed. We must encourage good men, who once served in the confederate army, when, as in this case, they cheerfully and zealously serve the national cause.

W. T. SHERMAN, General.

Mr. SPENCER. There is very little in this case. This man has been serving as a contract surgeon for four or five years; he has distinguished himself in that service, and consequently he has been examined and been appointed as a regular surgeon in the Army. The Senate cannot act on his appointment unless a bill for his relief is passed. In view of the recommendation of the Army officers under whom he served, the committee unanimously concluded that we ought to make this an exceptional case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont moves that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be glad to have that done, because I wish to look at exactly what the state of the law is now as it respects this whole subject. The only exceptional feature about this particular case appears to be that this gentleman served the confederacy when he was under twenty-one years of age. If that is a proper exception, then instead of passing this bill we ought to pass an act which provides in general that all classes of our fellow-citizens who served in the confederacy before they were twenty-one years of age shall not be debarred from appointment in the Army on account of their service under the confederacy. If this is to be treated as exceptional on the ground that this gentleman has served in the Army in fact for four years already by contract, then I should submit, I think with some confidence, that it does not make any exception at all in a just sense. It amounts to saying, if it be an exception, that this gentleman has acted differently while serving in the Army practically for four years from what other people who were engaged in the confederacy would have done. That I do not agree to. I do not suppose there is anybody who ever entertained the notion that a person who had served bravely and faithfully in that cause, as erroneous and as wrong as it was, would not serve bravely and faithfully in the Army of the United States when the power of that Army was directed against the Indians or any foreign foe. It would be an imputation upon the courage and the honor of every gentleman who engaged in the confederate service if this is to be treated as an exception.

It will not do, therefore, to say that this case is an exception for the reason that this gentleman having chosen voluntarily to engage by contract in the service of the Army of the United States has performed his duties gallantly and faithfully. That is an exception which would not stand a minute, Mr. President. As much as I disliked the confederacy and as much as I regret all that the confederacy attempted to do, and all that it did do, (and it came pretty near doing a good deal,) I certainly never entertained the notion that anybody who engaged in that would not have done, if he had since the opportunity, precisely what this gentleman has done, and that if he undertook to doctor the soldiers in times of peril he would not do it well. It will not do, therefore, to put it on such an exception.

Whether the time has come to wipe off from the statute-book this barrier which was placed there years ago, is an important question, which I would be glad to have time to consider. If it has come, then let us wipe it off manfully and squarely as to all of them or as to some class of them. If it has not come, then do not let us, on any individual pressure and upon an exception that does not exist in point of principle, undertake to pass favorite and personal legislation of this character. At any rate I should like to have the bill go over until we can think of it.

Mr. SPENCER. This is a very small matter. We certainly can dispose of the bill to-day without taking another time and occupying the Senate again by its consideration, which would be the result of letting it go over. I hope the bill will either be passed or rejected now. For my part I shall vote for it, and I hope all will vote for its passage.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I trust the bill will not go over, for this reason: the case as reported from the Committee on Military Affairs unquestionably presents as strong an appeal in equity in behalf of the bill as could well be presented. I fully concur with the Senator from Vermont that if this bill should pass it might be well to have a general law removing all disabilities in like cases. I have thought so for many years. As a matter of practical fact we know that one laboring under the disability of the third section of the fourteenth amendment must, according to the view taken by Congress, get his disabilities specially removed. I do not think it would be just or wise, as this gentleman has served the Government of the United States for four years thoroughly and well, as stated, in arduous and dangerous service, that his particular case should stand the chance of the passage of a general law any more than that one who asks for the removal of his disabilities under the fourteenth amendment should be kept waiting to the end of his life for a general law to be passed. It seems to me the two cases are parallel. I think this case stands on its own worth, and there are few, if any, who should vote against this bill, although they might vote against the removal of disabilities in such cases generally.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sorry that the honorable Senator from Alabama and the honorable Senator from Texas are in such hot haste that they are unwilling that a matter which involves so extensive considerations as this really does, on being called up in the morning hour and for the first time, should be laid over for a day in order that Senators who do not see their way quite so clearly may look into it. I should hope that the Senate would be willing to do that. But the suggestion made by the Senator from Texas as to the fourteenth amendment does not apply at all to this class of cases, as it appears to me. This gentleman, unless he held office under the United States and afterward engaged in the rebellion, is not amenable to the disabilities of the fourteenth amendment. It is not said that he did. Therefore the fourteenth amendment does not apply to him; but the act of Congress in respect of the Army of the United States (which was found, when the Army was most needed to protect the integrity of the Union, to have a very considerable proportion of its members turn up on the other side) provided that thereafter the Army should not be filled up by persons who engaged in war upon the United States. That is what the statute says. Of course, the provisions of that act gradually cease to apply, because the lapse of years brings upon the stage of military operations a new class of persons who were too young to have engaged in the rebellion in any intelligent sense, or at all, from that section of the Union, and who therefore are open to appointment, and are appointed in the Army and to West Point every day; but in respect of those who did actually engage in it there stands the act of Congress, and it was supposed to be based upon some principle, that if any untoward event of the same nature should happen in any section of the Union hereafter the Army would not be found in the condition that it was found in 1861, and that there were loyal citizens enough in the United States both North and South to keep the Army full of brave and patriotic and intelligent men without resorting to that class of our citizens.

I take it that no man has a right to be employed in the Army of the United States any more than he has a right to be employed in civil office. It is a question of choice by the Government acting in a constitutional way as to what citizens they will call upon or accept for the performance of the various kinds of public service. Congress has said in this law that in making choice of those who are to be intrusted with the military power of the Government that choice shall not fall upon the class of citizens who had undertaken to overthrow it. Now, it is proposed by this committee, and it is proposed to be done without time to consider for those who do not see quite so quickly as others, that instantly we shall make a precedent which will logically and necessarily lead us to follow it and enlarge upon it, and to generalize from it, until you have by implication and by practice repealed the law entirely. If the law ought to be repealed, then I submit, as I did before, it ought to be repealed in terms, and not by special selections of people who can first, as Mr. Jefferson Davis might himself, I suppose, get employed in some way in the military service and exert his well-known skill in that direction for a year or two, or three or four years, and then be entitled, upon this theory of special consideration, to be again appointed a major-general, or whatever he was, in the Army of the United States. If that be so, Mr. President, we ought to know it fairly and squarely, and not in such an indirect way as this. If the Senate is unwilling to have this matter postponed until to-morrow, I shall be very sorry.

Mr. INGALLS. Was not this bill reported this morning from the committee?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was.

Mr. INGALLS. Does it not, then, go over under the rules, if objection is made to its consideration?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It does not, having been entertained by the Senate by unanimous consent.

Mr. BECK. Is the bill open to amendment now?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion pending is that of the Senator from Vermont, that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow. The question is on that motion.

The question being put, it was declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Allison,	Booth,	Chaffee,	Edmunds,
Anthony,	Cameron of Wis.,	Christiancy,	Ferry,

Hamlin,	Kirkwood,	Morrill,	Rollins,
Howe,	Matthews,	Oglesby,	Saunders,
Ingalls,	McMillan,	Paddock,	Teller,
Kellogg,	Mitchell,	Plumb,	Windom.

NAYS—34.

Armstrong,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jones of Florida,	Randolph,
Bailey,	Dennis,	Kernan,	Ransom,
Bayard,	Eaton,	Lamar,	Spencer,
Beck,	Eustis,	McCreery,	Voorhees,
Burnside,	Garland,	McDonald,	Wallace,
Butler,	Grover,	McPherson,	Withers,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harris,	Maxey,	Whyte.
Cockrell,	Hereford,	Merrimon,
Coke,	Hill,	Morgan,

ABSENT—18.

Barnum,	Davis of Illinois,	Johnston,	Sharon,
Blaine,	Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Thurman,
Bruce,	Dorsey,	Patterson,	Wadleigh.
Conkling,	Gordon,	Sargent,
Conover,	Hoar,	Saulsbury,

So the motion was not agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BECK. When I rose to ask the question whether the bill was open to amendment, it was with the purpose of offering a second section to the bill for the repeal of section 1218 of the Revised Statutes providing that no person who had served in the military service of the Confederate States shall be appointed to any position in the Army. I will not move that amendment now to this bill, but I give notice that I will introduce a bill in the morning looking to that end.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Shall this bill be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 39, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—39.

Armstrong,	Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Paddock
Bailey,	Dennis,	Jones of Florida,	Randolph,
Bayard,	Dorsey,	Kernan,	Ransom,
Beck,	Eaton,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,
Burnside,	Eustis,	McCreery,	Spencer,
Butler,	Garland,	McDonald,	Voorhees,
Chaffee,	Grover,	McPherson,	Wallace,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Maxey,	Whyte,
Coke,	Hereford,	Merrimon,	Withers.
Conover,	Hill,	Morgan,

NAYS—21.

Allison,	Ferry,	Matthews,	Saunders,
Anthony,	Hamlin,	Mitchell,	Teller,
Booth,	Howe,	Morrill,	Windom.
Cameron of Wis.,	Ingalls,	Oglesby,
Dawes,	Kirkwood,	Plumb,
Edmunds,	McMillan,	Rollins,

ABSENT—16.

Barnum,	Christiancy,	Hoar,	Sargent,
Blaine,	Conkling,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Bruce,	Davis of Illinois,	Kellogg,	Thurman,
Cameron of Pa.,	Gordon,	Patterson,	Wadleigh.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I want to say one word. I voted against the engrossing of this bill, voting upon the question of time and not upon the merits of the bill. I dare say that to-morrow I should vote for the engrossing and for the passage of the bill, but just now I voted to postpone the consideration of the bill until to-morrow. It is very rarely, if ever, that I have known such a motion as that fail when put upon the ground that motion was put upon, simply asking for time to examine the present state of the law upon the question involved in this bill. The Senate denied that request upon what looked almost like a party vote. I did not think that question of postponement for a single day was a party question. Following that came the question of engrossing the bill, and that seems to have been decided very much upon the same ground. I voted with my political friends, and yet I do not know that I am opposed to the passage of this bill. I rather think I should vote in favor of the passage of the bill from what I heard fall from the mouth of the chairman of the committee that reported it, but I certainly could not vote for the passage of the bill to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill having had three several readings, the question is, shall it pass?

The bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution relative to the services to be observed on Thursday evening, January 16, 1879, in honor of the memory of Joseph Henry, late secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, under the auspices of the Regents thereof; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ARMY REORGANIZATION COMMISSION.

On motion of Mr. BURNSIDE, it was Ordered, That the members on the part of the Senate of the joint commission on the reorganization of the Army have leave to sit in committee during the session of the Senate to-morrow.

MEMORIAL SERVICES TO PROFESSOR HENRY.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate to take from the table the resolution of the House making provision for the services in memory of the late Professor Henry. I think it will occupy no time of the Senate, and it is desirable that it shall be passed, so that it may be known that the agreement is concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HOAR in the chair.) The Chair will lay before the Senate the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring therein,) That the Congress of the United States will take part in the services to be observed on Thursday evening, January 16, A. D. 1879, in honor of the memory of Joseph Henry, late secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, under the auspices of the Regents thereof, and for that purpose the Senators and Members will assemble on that evening in the Hall of the House of Representatives, the Vice-President of the United States, supported by the Speaker of the House, to preside on that occasion.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate consider the Calendar of general orders?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The morning hour has so nearly expired that it would hardly be useful to take up the general orders. I suggest that the morning hour be considered as concluded and that we proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The morning hour has expired by unanimous consent, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, will resume the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1308) to amend sundry provisions of chapter 1, title 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to presidential elections, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, upon which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, after the very full and clear statement of the principles on which the measure rests and of its conformity to the Constitution of the United States, to which we listened yesterday in the remarks of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] not much remains to be said by those who favor the bill now before the Senate. The friends of the bill can well afford to rest upon that exposition of its merits as a plan to regulate the counting of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States. I would cheerfully rest upon that argument, at least until it is assailed, if I did not recognize the propriety of stating my views upon this measure at this stage of the debate.

The Senator from Vermont and myself are not in harmony in our political affiliations; indeed we are very widely separated in this respect; but this circumstance has not prevented our concurrence of opinion as to the wisdom and necessity of this measure as a means which, if not fully satisfactory, is as nearly sufficient as any we are likely to adopt to save the country in future from some dangers which we have recently witnessed and from which we have barely escaped.

I allude to this matter, however, only to emphasize the statement that this bill is not shaped with any reference to the interests of any political party, so far as I know or believe. When this bill was reported to the Senate at the last session the attitude of the great political parties of the country, both in the House and in the Senate, was such that there appeared to be a most gratifying assurance that the adoption of a just and impartial system of laws governing presidential elections was possible. Some events which I need not recount have occurred since that time which have added something to the heat of party controversy. The nearer approach of the presidential election, which will occur within two years, has made it, perhaps, less probable that we can agree on a measure which has not in its provisions some specific reference to that event. But it is none the less our duty on that account, but on the contrary our duty seems to be rendered more imperative by the rapid approach of that election and by the pressure which ordinarily it exerts upon the public mind, to give to the country a constitutional, just, and acceptable system of laws for regulating and aiding in the enforcement of this great right, so far as it is to be affected by any officer or any department of the Government of the United States. In deciding upon a measure of such importance and in so framing its various parts as to secure to the States and to Congress, and to each House of Congress and to each member of Congress, the full and exact measure of every privilege, power, and right secured to each and all by the Constitution of the United States, there is need for dispassionate consideration and judgment and for that spirit of judicial impartiality which considers no result but the good of the country and no argument that would not as deeply impress the mind of true Americans fifty years hence as it would at this moment.

This is a question that does not necessarily grow clearer or that is even disembarrassed of doubts and difficulties by the mere lapse of time or by the march of events. Indeed, our experiences in this connection, while they furnish us with many solemn admonitions and have added to the number and gravity of the ascertained dangers that we are called upon to meet or to avoid, have failed to point out the precise measures through which we are to secure our safety and peace in the future. We are not yet standing in a light that is perfectly clear. The system heretofore adopted by Congress (if we can say with any exactness of speech that we have ever had a system) for the election of a President has been dangerously obscure, and its imperfections have been fearfully alarming on some occasions to the country. We have tried many experiments—efforts that are not entitled to a higher distinction when we contrast them with any proper system of laws adapted to a subject so important as this; and of the rulings that we have made in our twenty-three counts of votes for President of the United States I do not believe that either House of Congress would now be content to adopt all of those made on either occasion as a permanent plan. We would not adopt them as settled precedents even to the limited extent that those rulings have touched a few of the many questions which have arisen and may yet arise. We have not yet adopted any plans or indeed any theories that satisfy the country on this grave subject. Our latest plan, which was substituted for all previous rules, laws, and precedents, was of all others the most unsatisfactory. That plan has met almost universal condemnation, and it has left upon the minds of millions of our people a conviction that it was only an instrumentality to condone fraud and to expose the peace and welfare of the country to extreme danger. This plan, which wrecked all former precedents, and is itself in turn wrecked by the judgment of the people, in its disappearance has left us nothing but an unhappy experience as our guide. The entire field in reference to which we are now to legislate is open, without any law or rule of government that is to control the Senate and House of Representatives with reference to the real difficulties to be met when they shall convene in 1881 to count the next vote for President and Vice-President.

It is not to be denied, I think, that our electoral system, as it is developed in the Constitution and in the amendments thereto, is yet incomplete in some of the details of the plan which the framers of that great body of organic law projected. In failing to supply these omissions of details, particularly in the provisions that relate to the powers and duties of the two Houses of Congress in counting the votes, I believe that those who gave to us this new and then untried system felt that it was their duty to trust to the patriotism and wisdom of the people who should follow them to apply the lessons of experience as they arose to the bettering of their system; and I also believe that they thought that these deficiencies could be supplied and that their system could be fully perfected through the legislative powers of Congress and of the States; but chiefly of the States. They underestimated, possibly, the growth of this country and the enormous increase of presidential patronage and power through the multiplying of offices to be filled by his appointment; and, consequently, they failed to perceive fully the hazard of leaving a subject so replete with dangerous temptations to the fluctuating tide of feeling and interest that often sways the Congress back and forth, as a feather is tossed by a wave of the sea. Those who originated our electoral system preferred to trust to the patriotism of Congress rather than to the compulsion of mandatory provisions in the organic law to secure a fair count of the votes after the electors had cast them and certified them to the President of the Senate. I hope in this we shall not disappoint a sacred confidence.

In the part that I am permitted to take in the endeavor to supply what has been thus left unprovided I must, at least, feel conscious that I am not willingly engaged in the prostitution of this great trust to the mere purposes of partisanship, or to the advantage of any section of the country over another, or of any class of people at the expense of another class. I would not imperil, and certainly I would not deny, the rights or privileges of the people in electing presidential electors, or the rights of the States to provide by law for the manner of their appointment, or the rights of the Senate and House of Representatives in ascertaining and declaring the result of elections made by electors of President and Vice-President, or the rights of the States, through their Representatives in Congress, as the second or substituted electoral bodies, to elect these officers; but I would provide such reasonable and just rules of evidence and of procedure as would enable each State to certify its vote in a manner to secure its being counted, and also to enable the tribunals appointed to count and declare the elections to perform their respective constitutional duties with certainty, with justice, and without conflict.

In seeking the best and safest guide in this delicate and difficult work it has seemed to me that it is to be found in the closest following of the language of the Constitution. I am not acquainted with any plan that has more impressed me with its faithfulness to the Constitution than the measure reported by the select committee of the Senate. It is this feature of close observance of the Constitution that, above all others, has satisfied the doubts that have arisen in my mind in my efforts to explore the wide field of operations which is covered by this bill, so that I might feel satisfied in conclusion as to its usefulness and safety to the country in the present time and in the future. Fearful doubts and misgivings must arise in the mind of any man as to the consequences that will follow a measure which is so constantly in contact with every powerful and moving passion and so sensibly affects every possible interest of many millions living and to live. In this matter I confess that I desire to take shelter as closely as possible under the Constitution as my proper protection against the consequences if evil instead of good should result from this measure. I vote for it more on the ground that I believe it is constitutionally correct than because I believe it to be the wisest or safest measure that could be devised if we were now permitted to legislate without any constitutional constraint. There is in our presidential electoral system a feature that is so opposed to the free popular system upon which all other elections in the United States are based that public opinion, choosing between the two systems, has almost neutralized the constitutional functions of the colleges of presidential electors and has deprived them of that high power of independent action which was originally designed as a check upon the popular will, and has completely subordinated the electors to the position of mere registers of the wishes of the people. This discrepancy between the popular will and the electoral system is much in the way of proper legislation. For many years past an earnest effort has been put forth to dispense with the intervention of the electoral colleges as being merely formal and useless parts of the machinery of government, and dangerous because they have on some occasions been the means of thwarting the popular will as declared in the election. But that is still our constitutional system, and while it remains it should be our care to guard it the more sedulously because it is for the time without the jealous guardianship which always attends those provisions of the Constitution that engage the affections of the people.

We have two bodies of electors who may choose a President and Vice-President. The primary body, appointed in each State under State laws, has the power to vote for President and Vice-President in the electoral colleges and to transmit the record of their votes, certified to the President of the Senate. This body, consisting of many colleges, has the power to elect, but it has not the power to count the votes cast or to ascertain or to declare the election. This board (I use the term for convenience) has the absolute right to name the persons who alone may be elected to these offices. The power of election, whether successfully completed by the action of this board or by its successor, is confined to the persons it may name in the votes cast in the several colleges. So that under our Constitution the power of nomination to these offices originates with, and is confined to, this primary board. No person can be made President of the United States by election to that office who is not voted for in the electoral colleges. If every elector chosen in the States should so far betray and disappoint the expressed wishes of the people as to vote directly against their instructions, no power in this Government could lawfully question the validity of their choice. Their absolute right, under certain constitutional restrictions, to elect a President and Vice-President according to their own views of their duty to the country is beyond all dispute under our Constitution; but they cannot claim this supreme power or lawfully exercise it unless the States have conferred it upon them by appointment under State laws. And no other power is set up in the Constitution that is expressly authorized to adjudge and decide upon the validity of their appointment. If such a power belongs to the Senate and House of Representatives when they are assembled to count the votes, it is a power that is derived by implication from the power to direct the counting of the vote. Express power is given by the Constitution to the States to appoint electors and to provide by law for the manner in which that appointment shall be made. The power thus conferred includes necessarily the right to do everything that is essential to a valid and complete appointment of electors. It cannot be said, however, that any express power is given to any other tribunal to annul or disregard the appointment of electors made by the States.

When the people or the other appointing power of each State have appointed electors they have conferred upon them a high office and a great dignity—an office of extraordinary powers, which, with reference to the rights of the incumbent, is not to be lightly considered. One who participates in the election of a President and Vice-President, as the appointee of a State, would in any country less democratic than ours be regarded with great reverence, and his rights, in the full and free exercise of his official powers and duties, would be guarded with the most jealous care. Whatever respect our people may feel for this office and its incumbents, Congress must value them according to the fact that in this office is reposed so much of the destiny of this great country as depends upon the choice of its Chief Magistrate once at least every four years.

The power conferred upon the Senate and House of Representatives to count the votes is of a subordinate character, when compared with the power given to the several electors to cast the votes for President and Vice-President. The two Houses of Congress cannot in any event appoint or elect a President of the United States, nor can they appoint an elector. They can only obey the choice made by the electors, as they are informed that it has been lawfully expressed, and after this is ascertained they may declare the result. So the powers of the two Houses, while they are separate from those of the States, and are independent of the powers of the States, are not above them. In this sphere of authority the States are supreme, and are not amenable to the control of any other power.

The supremacy of the States in the appointment of electors is derived by a grant in the Constitution of the United States; and in view of the provision of the Constitution which declares that the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof are supreme, ultimately and undeniably this power when exercised by a State is as supreme as the power of Congress when exerted in the enactment of any law plainly within its constitutional authority. Yet in what I have to say in this bill, as in any vote I may give with reference to it, I shall not lose sight of the fact that is equally apparent, that the Senate and House of Representatives, by concurring in any count of the electoral votes, and by declaring as a result of the count the election of certain persons for whom the electors had voted as President and Vice-President, can make that election valid under the Constitution. This power could be abused so that the people would refuse submission to the persons so declared elected; but such refusal would be revolution, however much it might be justified in morals or by the right to demand redress for governmental abuse.

When we see, therefore, that under our constitutional electoral system there may be such serious conflict between the rights and authority of the States and of the Senate and House of Representatives, and that the latter may undo or disregard the action of the former, we can better understand and appreciate the importance of a wise and proper exercise of the legislative powers of Congress as an intermediary between these two great and distinct constitutional electoral bodies.

If it does not rest with Congress to provide by law some means that may be adequate to prevent an unseemly and dangerous antagonism between these bodies, then there is no power that can come between them, and we must abandon our country to the dangers of revolution on every occasion when a President is to be chosen. The very apprehensions we all feel that Congress may make matters worse by trying to better them by legislation grow out of our earnest convictions that the dangers which threaten our country in this direction are real and terrible.

It has been contended by some that Congress has no authority whatever to provide any laws for the government of the Houses met to count the votes for President, and that all such legislation is improper. I think it is a sufficient answer to this objection that the provisions of the Constitution in reference to the counting of the electoral votes are not in any respect self-executing. They are of that class of powers mentioned in section 8 of article 1 which are to be carried into execution by laws to be enacted by Congress. By the express provision of that section Congress may pass laws to carry into execution any powers provided for in the Constitution, whether vested in the Government of the United States or in any Department or officer thereof. The Congress of the United States, in the very beginning of our Government, enacted laws on this subject, and so far as legislative precedent and legislative contemporaneous construction of the Constitution can go they have exploded the theory upon which the objectors are proceeding that I have referred to. It was then provided that—

Each State may, by law, provide for the filling of any vacancies which may occur in its college of electors when such college meets to give its electoral vote.

It also provided that—

Whenever any State has held an election for the purpose of choosing electors, and has failed to make a choice on the day prescribed by law, the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day in such a manner as the Legislature of such State may direct.

In order to give some more complete effect to that provision of the Constitution, which perhaps the framers of this law thought was more permissive than mandatory, in the same act it was provided that—

The electors shall vote for President and Vice-President, respectively, in the manner directed by the Constitution.

It did not annex any penalty to their failure to vote, but it undertook to enforce, I suppose upon the conscience of electors, the necessary public duty of discharging the functions of the great office conferred upon them by the States respectively.

The same course of reasoning adopted by those who suggest this objection which would deprive Congress of all right to provide by law for the procedure to be followed in counting the electoral vote would equally apply, and with more force, to the regulations that are imposed by law even upon the Supreme Court. That court is the final arbiter of every cause and every question that falls within its jurisdiction. It can make a final judgment and compel its execution. It is certainly as independent of Congress as is the officer or tribunal authorized to count the electoral vote, yet Congress defines its jurisdiction in many instances, limits it in others, gives it writs and other processes, provides for it clerks and other officers, prescribes its terms, and declares what number of judges shall constitute a quorum, compels it to obey laws that regulate the instruments of evidence, the weight of evidence, the competency of witnesses, and the effect of evidence. Congress requires the Supreme Court to adopt the practice of the State courts and to abandon the rules of practice adopted by the judges when they are in conflict and to give effect to the decisions of State courts upon the validity of State statutes, though the decisions they are bound to obey are against the conscience of the judges. I fail to perceive that the course of legislation on such subjects gives the slightest weight to the objection that Congress cannot even regulate the procedure of the tribunal that is to count the electoral votes.

This bill, as I understand its provisions, is framed upon the proposition that the power to adjudge and to decide upon the validity of the appointment of electors resides in the States, and may be completely and finally exercised through tribunals created by State laws and regulated in their procedure by State laws. It does not, however, adopt the idea that, if the States decline to adjudge and decide conclusively who are appointed electors, there is no other constitutional authority that can make such a decision. On the contrary, it provides rules to govern in such case the action of the two Houses of Congress as the tribunal which may decide, if the State has failed to decide, the validity of the appointment of the electors. Without stopping at this point to consider more particularly the provisions of this part of the bill with reference to their fitness to accomplish this purpose, I proceed to say that the bill does not by express provision attempt to dispose of the question of the eligibility of the electors that may be appointed by the States. I think that this is the true constitutional course to be observed in this matter. The Constitution expressly declares certain grounds of ineligibility of electors, which operate ex proprio vigore so as to annul any appointment of such persons.

Other grounds of disqualification of electors may exist, such as age or sex, a want of citizenship, insanity, or corruption through bribery, which the bill does not attempt to provide for. It is a presumption that we must indulge that the States will make provision for such cases in their laws respecting the qualifications of electors, but if they shall fail to do so the Houses of Congress are at liberty to act upon such objections. The bill includes the power of the Houses to take such action by requiring their concurrence in a separate and affirmative vote in counting or refusing to count all votes that have been transmitted to them by the colleges of electors, excepting only the instance in which the States whose returns are questioned have through their own tribunals determined who are lawfully appointed electors of such States upon a controversy instituted for that purpose.

The leading provisions of this measure may be thus stated with reference to the principles on which they are founded:

First. The bill secures firmly and broadly that "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress."

Second. It secures to the State the right to determine under its own laws what persons have been appointed as electors.

Third. This right the State can enforce fully and conclusively, in reference to all matters that are constitutionally within its jurisdiction, if a contest or controversy arises and is carried before the State tribunals for decision.

Fourth. It asserts the right in Congress to give to the action of a State so deciding a controversy as to who are appointed electors, a conclusive effect as evidence of the lawful title of electors who shall have been so determined to have been appointed; and that such evidence shall govern in counting the vote, without the necessity of the concurrence of the two Houses in a vote affirming its validity.

Fifth. It secures to the States the right to demand the separate and affirmative concurrent vote of the two Houses in counting the electoral vote, in the following cases:

1. In rejecting a vote from a State from which but one return has been received.

2. In deciding which of two tribunals in a State, claiming the right to determine which of the electors have been appointed, is the lawful tribunal; and,

3. In deciding which of two or more returns from a State shall be counted, where the State tribunals have not determined who are the electors.

Sixth. It secures to a Senator and a member of the House of Representatives the right to join in a demand that the two Houses, met to count the vote, shall consider, separately, any objection in writing that they may submit to the counting of any vote that is offered to be counted.

The bill does not attempt to define what shall be the character of the objection thus to be submitted; it only provides that in certain named cases or circumstances it shall require the concurrent affirmative vote of the Houses, voting separately, to reject the vote to which objection is made, and in the other cases it requires a vote in like manner concurring and affirmative to admit the vote to be counted.

The concurrence of the Houses, that is thus required, does not depend upon the nature of the objection to the vote, but upon the circumstances attending it when it is offered to be counted.

If the State authorities have certified the electors in due form, according to State laws, then the vote is to be counted, unless the Houses concur in an affirmative vote to reject it. If it has been passed upon by the State tribunal duly authorized by State laws to determine its validity upon a contest, then it is to be counted. In these instances the vote is supported by either a presumptive or conclusive intendment in favor of its validity, which is imparted to it by the action of the State authorities. In the absence of such presumption, or where it operates alike in reference to two or more persons claiming a right to cast the same vote, this bill requires the Houses by an affirmative vote to determine which is the lawful vote. If the States neglect or refuse to make final and conclusive decisions of all matters within their jurisdiction, (all matters indeed that relate to the validity of the appointment of electors,) it seems but reasonable that when the tribunal that is required to count the vote and declare the election acts upon the subject, it should be provided by law that only one branch of that tribunal should not be permitted finally to determine the matter. It is the better and safer rule that the Houses should concur, even if in such case their non-concurrence should disfranchise the State. Every State can save its vote, if it will do so, against the power of any tribunal lawfully to exclude it for any cause except for the constitutional disability of its electors or for fraud in the action of the State tribunal that determines the validity of the appointment.

If this bill becomes a law the States will see the importance of using their rightful authority to provide for the settlement of contested elections or the appointment of electors before the electoral vote is cast. It is within the scope of their authority to compel persons to contest the question whether they are the lawful electors before the State tribunals and to enact laws which shall annul every pretext of lawful authority to represent the State in the electoral colleges that is claimed by persons who refuse to enter such contests. The distinct enunciation of these rights and powers of the State governments will induce them, as I believe, to settle all questions of contested claims by different persons to the lawful authority to cast electoral votes of the States, and they will thus be excluded as elements of strife from consideration by the Senate and the House when they are met to count the votes.

I do not like the words "on paper purporting to be a return" found in several connections in the sixth section of the bill, and especially do I mistrust the effect of these words when they occur in line 53 of the sixth section:

> And in such case of more than one return, or paper purporting to be a return, from a State, if there shall have been no such determination of the question in the State as aforesaid, then those votes and those only shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall concurrently decide to be the lawful votes of the legally appointed electors of such State.

I am afraid that their presence in the text of the law would suggest an inducement to some enterprising persons to send to the Vice-President papers purporting to be returns from States, and by means of such fraud gain the possible advantage of disfranchising a State to get rid of its vote against their favorite.

The words signify nothing in the structure of the sentence where they occur beyond a [illegible]utious effort to embrace every possible case that could arise upon more than one return from a State; each return having some real ground of good faith to support its claim to recognition.

I think this overcaution to prevent the exclusion of a return made in good faith from consideration by the two Houses, on the ground that, in contemplation of law, it is not in fact a return, opens a still wider door to the danger of the introduction of returns that are not made in good faith; that are merely simulated returns, but are drawn up in such form as that they purport to be honest returns. These reflections also suggest the point, upon which the bill is silent, that where a paper purporting to be a return from a State of a vote by electors for President and Vice-President is sent to the President of the Senate, and a question is made whether it is a forged, or false, or simulated paper, that either House should have the right to declare its judgment that such paper is false, or forged, or simulated, and that thereupon it should be rejected. And also that such an objection, when made, should be acted upon separately by each House, and its decision should be announced by the presiding officer in joint meeting, before any other objection should be considered to such vote. These points escaped my attention in the committee, and I now suggest them to the committee, as I should have done at that time, for their consideration. It may be that the bill will be improved by their introduction into it by amendment; at all events it is proper that I should bring these matters to the attention of the committee and of the Senate.

This bill is an earnest and bold movement to assert the rights of the States in the enjoyment of this important privilege of free constitutional government. It recognizes the right of each State to appoint electors to vote for President and Vice-President and the right of the Legislature of each State to direct the manner of appointing electors. This is an express grant of constitutional power to the States, and by necessity the power thus granted is supreme in the same sense that the Constitution of the United States is supreme. The power to appoint electors and to direct the manner of their appointment cannot be taken away from the States by any law or by the action of any department of the United States Government. This power must be removed from the Constitution before it can be denied to the States or before any department of the Government can usurp it or participate in its exercise. It is a power that must be fully and completely exercised by the States in conformity to State laws without their being constrained, directed, or obstructed by any other power whatever.

The States have each the supreme right granted to them in the Constitution to enforce such laws as their Legislature may enact, directing the manner of appointing electors; and this right is in full effect until the choice has been so made. The office of elector is created by the Constitution of the United States, and it is filled by the appointment of a certain number of persons by the States in pursuance of State laws. Every act of the State government that is done in conformity to its laws, and that is not inconsistent with other parts of the Constitution of the United States, in providing a manner of appointment and in making an appointment of electors, is conclusively binding on the Senate and House of Representatives when they are assembled to open and count the votes and declare the election of a President and Vice-President of the United States. At what point in this State procedure will any other power intervene to arrest, correct, or reverse its action? And if no other power can so intervene, where do we find the constitutional authority in any tribunal to reject or disregard the lawful action of the State in the appointment of electors? It does not exist, Mr. President, as to any act that it is within the jurisdiction of the State to perform, or in reference to any fact that it is within its jurisdiction to ascertain and determine under its own laws, so as to completely exercise the power of appointment. Within these limits of jurisdiction the authority of the State to determine finally every fact necessary to the full exercise of its power of appointment, as it is regulated by its own laws, is conclusive and unquestionable.

In those States where the right to elect the electors is confided by State laws to the people, the right to ascertain whether fraud has corrupted the election and to what extent the election has thus corrupted—has been invalidated—is a right that rests solely with the State tribunals created by the State laws to decide. The power is given by the Constitution to each House of Congress to judge of the election of its members. Such power is not given to each House, or to both, to judge of the election of electors of President and Vice-President of the United States by the people of the State.

It is the right of each State to determine these elections and declare the result through its own tribunals. The choice of electors in a State may be by popular election, or it may be by appointment of the governor, or by the Legislature, if the State laws so provide.

This choice, when made and duly certified by the State authorities, is not to be acted upon by the Senate and House of Representatives as merely an election within a State, but as an appointment by the State. When every person required by State laws to participate in the acts necessary to make a valid appointment of electors has performed the duty required by such laws, and the record of these acts is ascertained by the designated State authority to be lawful and complete, the result is the authentic act of the State appointing electors of President and Vice-President. To go back through all these preliminary acts with an inquiry as to frauds in every ballot-box and irregularities in every return, to find a point on which to question this result, is to deny entirely all the force and significance of the Constitution which says that "each State shall appoint" a number of electors in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct. If one line of inquiry may thus be prosecuted, any and every question must be open, and the consequence would be that the procedure in the States, which must result in the appointment of electors, or in nothing, would be no more than a collection of facts upon which the Houses could declare the State disfranchised, or else they would make the appointment of electors that they determined that the State should have made.

We cannot rationally assume that if these matters are at all open to question, after the State has passed upon them in the final act of appointing electors, the two Houses of Congress are authorized either in joint or separate action to revise the decision of the States and to go into the merits of the case, as such interference is called.

The Constitution affords no hint of the existence of such power in both or either of the Houses. It is entirely silent upon this point, and if we contrast this studied silence in reference to any such power in the Senate or House of Representatives with the express grant of power to the States to appoint electors in such number as they may direct by law, there can be no reasonable ground for doubt that this express grant of power was intended to exclude the idea of any grant of a power by implication to any other tribunal that is in such direct hostility of conflict with the rights of the State.

This bill does not affirm the right of the two Houses to question the validity of an election of presidential electors in a State by the people, nor does it disaffirm the right except in the case where the State authorities, acting under a law of the State, have, upon a contest instituted, determined the validity of the appointment of electors as a result of such election. The bill deals only with the vote that is necessary to be concurrently given by the two Houses in rejecting an electoral vote from a State that may be regularly certified by the State authorities. The bill might have gone farther and have closed all investigations into the mere regularity of the action of the State in making the appointment of electors, and all inquiry whether the state of facts upon which that action was based justified the appointment of the persons as electors who afterward cast the votes; but it would be useless to make a provision of law to govern the two Houses in anything beyond the regulation of their procedure, since they are the final judges of the election of President and Vice-President and their declaration of the result is conclusive. The Houses, I admit, will judge and determine the extent to which their inquiries may reach in their effort to ascertain who are the legal electors of a State; but if the paramount right of the State has been exerted lawfully in deciding upon the same issue, then the matter is finally decided and the Houses must accept it as a final decision if they respect the Constitution. And I hold, but the bill does not assert the doctrine, that in the absence of any decision of the State tribunals, made upon a contest, the action of the State authority in certifying to the appointment of electors, if it is made in pursuance of the laws of the State, is final unless it is assailed for the fraud of the State tribunal in making and certifying such decision.

The true rule as I believe in reference to this much-mooted question is that an honest judgment of the lawful State tribunal must stand, though it be erroneous, and a judgment rendered corruptly has no validity. But the bill leaves this question open, except that it very properly adopts the rule that all presumptions are in favor of the honesty of dealing on the part of governments and of public officers as well as of all private citizens. I do not undertake to say that there is a clear and express authority in the Constitution for all the provisions of this bill, but I have not been able to discover that any of its provisions are in conflict with the Constitution or that the bill infringes upon the constitutional authority and jurisdiction of either House of Congress. It is a bill to regulate the exercise of constitutional powers in some of the particulars in reference to which the Constitution is silent, and to secure obedience to the Constitution where its provisions are express. The great point secured by the bill is the right of the States to determine in their own tribunals, when a contest is made, who are the electors rightfully appointed by the State. This is the only case in which the Senate and House of Representatives, met in convention, are bound by this law to accept and count a vote of one elector to the exclusion of another.

Still this is a rule of evidence, and not a rule of decision. It is also directory, and cannot be mandatory. As a decision it relates only to the question which of two returns shall be counted, the one in preference to the other, and on that point it is conclusive, because the State has already decided through its lawful tribunals which is its lawful vote, and by necessity has excluded the other. It does not preclude the right of the concurring Houses to deny to the State a right to have its electors cast the vote, if the decision by which those electors were held to be lawfully appointed was a judgment corruptly rendered by the State tribunal, or if the elector was bribed to cast his vote for the person for whom he voted; or if he had become insane, and was in that condition when he voted; or if he was disqualified, at the time of his appointment, under the provisions of the Constitution. These and other like fatal objections to a vote cast by an elector are made available for its rejection under the provision of the bill that "no electoral vote or votes from any State from which but one return has been received shall be rejected, except by the affirmative vote of both Houses." This part of the bill I consider a distinct admission of the powers of the two Houses, acting separately but concurrently, to reject any vote of any State by an affirmative vote, but not an admission of its right to count or consider a vote that the lawful tribunal of the State has rejected on a contest before it. This is a necessary corollary to the power of the Houses to make a judicial decision, or a conclusive declaration as to the validity of any vote that the State authority has not condemned upon a contest had before it.

It would neither be wise nor safe to undertake to specify the cases in which such decisions to reject a vote may be made, if, indeed, we have the power to do this. The Houses count the votes and declare the result under the powers given them by the Constitution, and we cannot abridge this right, but we can regulate its exercise. I believe that it is true that the Houses met to count the votes may, by a concurrent action, disregard the laws enacted to regulate their procedure and may yet declare an election which will be valid under the Constitution. This is a consequence of the finality of these decisions, and a sanction that must sometimes be given to usurpation for the sake of peace. Yet it is a duty that Congress cannot properly omit to provide such regulations for their guidance and government as are requisite to secure, as far as possible, the peaceful and safe transmission of the chief executive power from one person to another in accordance with the results of our quadrennial elections. If we are to suppose that laws enacted by Congress and approved by the President will be violated by the tribunal that is to make the final and conclusive declaration of the election of our Presidents and Vice-Presidents, we can with equal certainty assume that this will not be done against the expressed will of the people, or without the urgent necessity of preventing some great wrong to the country. In any event our plain course of duty seems to be in the direction of an effort to regulate by law, as far as we can, the procedure in counting the electoral votes.

In all countries the transmission of the supreme executive authority from one person to another, in succession, is always perilous and is always agitating to the public mind. Our system of constitutional law, aided by statutes, can be made comparatively secure against such dangers. Still we have had some struggles in our elections which should admonish us of the danger of leaving these contests without the greatest security that may be provided by wise and just laws. It is true that such laws cannot be made penal in their character, so as to punish those who alone are required to respect and obey them, and yet do sometimes violate them. But if we enact laws that are correct in principle and just in their provisions, I believe that public opinion will so far sustain them that few will be found who are sufficiently reckless to disobey them.

It is too late to make rules or enact laws to govern the action of the two Houses after the arrival of the period for their joint meeting to count the votes. The hazard of leaving this subject open until after the States have appointed electors is too fearfully illustrated in our last presidential election to require anything beyond a mere allusion to our then condition to startle the country with alarm at the thought that we may be again exposed to such perils.

The highest demand of duty, supported by a decent respect for the honor of the country and by a proper regard for its safety, requires that we should legislate, as far as we can, in advance of the next presidential election, to secure judicial fairness and impartiality in the count of the electoral votes. We may not, by such legislation, secure this result, but we shall, at least, be able to save ourselves from the reproach of having failed to do what we could to provide, in advance, against the betrayal of the rights of the States and of the people, through the interested zeal of the great political parties or the corrupt interference of men who are ever alert to gain power and riches at the expense of everything that is sacred.

Nothing can be more disturbing to the country or can more seriously affect its prosperity than to aggravate the anxieties of the people with reference to the count of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President.

If Congress denies to itself the power to provide laws to regulate the counting of the votes, or refuses to provide such regulations, it will confirm the apprehensions of many of our people, I might say millions of them, that we shall never again be able, peacefully, to count the votes for President and Vice-President where the election is close. If the bill now before the Senate is defective or vicious, let us find a proper substitute for it; but let us not neglect a duty that we owe to humanity, as well as to our country, by refusing to make some provision of law that will at least assist the constituted authorities in placing the chief executive power, peacefully, in the possession of the man whom the people shall elect through the appointed agents of the States representing the people.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I shall consume but very little of the time of the Senate in stating my objections to this bill. The subject it professes to regulate is so full of difficulties that I have no complaint to make of the efforts of the committee, and I freely admit that it is much easier to point out objections to the measure than to supply them by better and wiser provisions.

The first section of the bill, following the Constitution, requires that all the electors shall be appointed on the second Tuesday in October. The fixing of the time is left to Congress, but the day, whatever it may be, must be the same throughout the United States. This requirement, as we know, was regarded as a most important one, for it is plain that if the appointment of electors could take place in the States on different days, the election of the Chief Magistrate would be controlled by intrigues and influences which would stifle the honest voice of the people. Suppose it were competent for the States to vote on different days, that all but one State voted on the same day and that the vote of this last State was sufficient to determine the election of President: does any one suppose that after it was ascertained that the election depended upon the vote of a single State it would be possible to have an election there which would be free and tranquil? Is it not clear that every influence of party and power, all that wealth and authority could do, would be done on both sides of the contest to secure that vote? And is it not more than probable that such an immense power concentrated within such narrow bounds would prove too strong for the arm of local authority; and with the mind of the whole country excited as we know it would be, an outbreak of violence on such an occasion and in such a State would convulse the entire Union? Every evil which would be likely to result from the appointment of electors on different days might be expected to follow from the operation of this bill.

The framers of the Constitution guarded the interest not of one State but of every State. The question here is not in regard to the right of a single Commonwealth to select its delegates in the electoral college, but it involves a greater power: it involves the right to select a number of men who, it may be, will hold in their hands the title to the first office in the world.

What does the Constitution mean when it requires the appointment of the electors to be made on the same day throughout the Union? Does it not mean that on that day, and on that day alone, the rights and powers of every elector shall be fixed and determined, so that the whole country on the night of the day of the election can understand who has been elected President? What, sir, would be our condition if, after the election on the second Tuesday in October and until the 1st of January following, nearly three months, this great country, with its immense interests, should be kept in a state of suspense and excitement? I need not tell grave Senators of the influence which an event like this has upon all the business interests of the country, how much is gained to all classes when it is satisfactorily ended, or how much is lost when uncertainty intervenes to produce alarms and dangers. Under the fourth section of this bill, should it become a law, no one would be able to tell who was elected President until after the contests which it provides for were all settled. The time intervening between the election and the meeting of the electors may be taken up by legal proceedings to determine the title of a sufficient number of electors to control the presidential office. And ought an issue of that kind—one so full of danger to the whole country, involving its peace and happiness, and it may be the liberty of every man within it—be confided to some local magistrate who never had an idea above what was necessary to settle matters of petty jurisdiction? While the Constitution very wisely has left the mode of selecting electors to the States and is not particular as to how this power is exercised, still it has taken the precaution to guard the interests of the whole Union in two most important particulars connected with such elections. These are that all the electors must be appointed on the same day and that they must cast their votes for President and Vice-President on the same day.

Whatever you may do here you must not and cannot leave open any important question entering into the appointment of electors after the second Tuesday in October. The people of the whole Union have an interest in this matter even greater than any which can belong to any State, for a contest over a single vote in Florida or Oregon, as we well know, might lead to the agitation of the whole country, and endanger the very foundations of the Government. Have we not had some experience of what is likely to result in every case of a close election when under any system of laws the power of electing a President is placed in the hands of a few men, or an insignificant tribunal? When during the last election it was ascertained that the fate of the Presidency depended upon the decision of two persons unknown beyond the neighborhood in which they lived, and that they carried in their pockets the fortunes of the two great parties of the country, did not these men and the State to which they belonged rise to a height of interest and importance never before dreamt of by any one? Can we ever forget the patriotic pilgrimages of those "visiting statesmen," who, laying aside for a time the ease and comforts which surrounded them, rushed into Florida and Louisiana to fawn and cringe before the new-born majesty of McLin and Wells? Is any one weak enough to imagine that if it should again happen that the fate of the Presidency depended upon the decision of a local court of any kind a controversy like that could be carried on like other contests?

Do we not know that in proportion to the magnitude of the interests involved, the hopes and fears excited by the event, such a tribunal would rise to the highest pitch of importance and power? Would you expect to see the two great parties of the Union, forty millions of people, stand quietly by and await with calmness and composure the result of such a proceeding? Figure to your mind the picture of two local parties with Smith's Form Book on one corner of their table and a defaced copy of the Holy Bible on the other, sitting in a spare room of a country grocery and hearing with studied patience the great question who they should make President of the United States.

Sir, I once witnessed something like this, and I pray to God I shall never behold anything like it again. I saw two men carried by accident to the highest pitch of this great power. I saw the fortunes and destinies of this whole people for a time in the keeping of a returning board in a single State. I saw them surrounded by parasites and flatterers from every quarter of the land. I saw how "the stormy wave of the multitude retired at their approach." I witnessed with sorrow and humiliation and apprehension for the country the congregation of a large part of the Army of the United States to do the bidding of these men and to put down the strong indignation of the people. After seeing all this, I am well satisfied that nothing could be more unwise or unsafe than to give the sanction of congressional legislation to a mode of settling electoral contests which has been tried and found wanting. There is nothing in this bill which leads us to conclude that any different processes will be resorted to, in some of the States at least, to determine the Presidency than were resorted to in 1876. The character of the tribunal is not designated; there is nothing definite; it is left absolutely to the decision of the States, and it was boldly claimed in 1876 that when a State decided through a returning board that one set of electors was elected the tribunal here must acquiesce. That is the principle of this bill. I must confess that the fourth section of this bill is not at all satisfactory to me. Under this bill any returning board could perpetrate as much fraud as it pleased and certify it here and there would be no power to look into it.

I am aware that the late electoral commission based its conclusions upon the conclusive character of the State returns. But did this concession to State power and sovereignty, did this following the shadow and disregarding the substance, satisfy the people of the States concerned or a majority of the voters of the United States?

But suppose the States do not adopt the suggestion of Congress as contained in this bill, where is your power to enforce it? You say in the fourth section that the States may enact laws looking to the adjustment of all controversies growing out of the election of presidential electors in the State; but you cannot enforce that. You admit upon the face of your bill that you have no power to enforce it, that it is a mere suggestion from this Government to the States that they ought to pass a law providing for the adjustment of all electoral controversies. Suppose the laws of the States remain as they now are after the passage of this bill, and it is very likely that they would in a great measure so remain, what would be the effect of a State return? Would it be prima facie or conclusive evidence of its correctness. Or suppose some States decide to provide machinery for the adjustment of electoral contests and others do not. You have no power to enforce your wishes in this matter. You would be compelled to adopt two distinct rules in regard to the same kind of returns. If one State shall follow the suggestion of the law and constitute a tribunal prior to the time fixed for the counting of the electoral votes and if there should be a trial and a determination to settle that question, I presume when the latter return came here it would be accepted under the provisions of this law as conclusive. But suppose that the State did not, relying upon the law as it now stands—and the laws throughout the Union are generally satisfactory on that subject and simply comply with the act of 1792—and certified only the title of the electors, what then? In the one case I presume the record would be conclusive evidence that they were the electors, and in the other it would be only prima facie evidence. Unless you have the power to enforce this uniform rule and make it applicable to all States, I think you will find great difficulty in carrying out this part of it.

Notwithstanding all that has been said in favor of this bill as a State-rights measure it gives to Congress a power over the election of President which in my judgment is most dangerous. It was the observation of a very wise man on this floor that there is very little difference between leaving the presidential election to Congress and leaving Congress to decide that election. The sixth section of this bill gives Congress the power to set aside the vote of any State in this Union if one Senator and one Representative can be found to object to it. This is stating it pretty broadly, but the power is there. I know it is not a legitimate argument to argue against the existence of power from the abuse of it; but on questions of this kind all experience teaches us that whenever Congress is called to act it will act in a party spirit. Unfortunately for the country, unfortunately for all, it will be impossible to obtain any decision by Congress, in my judgment, on a question of this kind into which party spirit will not enter. That is the great danger in the whole business. Am I to be told that the party majority in Congress will always be wise, moderate, and just, and that there is no danger from usurpation and passion? Give to one Senator and one Representative the power to set in motion this congressional machinery against the electoral votes of the States, and I believe, sir, that the time is not far distant when it will prove to be the most dangerous delegation of authority ever conferred upon two men.

There are many other objections that I could make to this bill; but I conceive that it is most important in the view that I take of the meaning of the Constitution, and the practice under it, that there should be no outstanding contest over the electors after election day if it can be possibly avoided; that the Constitution in requiring the electors to be selected on a given day, and placing that time under the control of the General Government, clearly indicates what the purpose was in regard to it. It was that everything appertaining to or connected with the election of the electors should be settled upon that day. The counting of their votes was another thing and was remitted to another tribunal. The casting of their votes was another thing, and that was required to be done at a certain day in order to cut off the possibility of intrigue and those other influences which we well know have in times past operated to destroy freedom. Each independent elector voting in his State at a designated time would not be open to the same temptations that an aggregate college of electors sitting together would be open to. This was the reason that induced the framers of the Constitution to make the time uniform when they should meet and cast the votes of the States. What difference is there between electing electors on different days and leaving open after the election day a number of contests which may involve the title to their offices? After the first Tuesday in October the election is over, but you have a contest in Florida, in North Carolina, in Kentucky, it may be in New York, and no living man would be able to say what will be the decision of those local tribunals to whose judgments, under this bill, the main question is submitted. The election has settled nothing; it has brought a controversy into existence which in its progress, as I said a while ago, may involve the very foundations of the Government, for the reason I have assigned.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if no other gentleman wishes to occupy the floor, as I desire to get on with this bill, I will now say a word in reply to my distinguished friend from Florida, whose point of objection to the fourth section of the bill is, first, that it leaves provision for a controversy which cannot be determined and will not be determined on the day on which by law the electors are appointed throughout the United States, and that that is fatal to the philosophy and to the safety of the scheme. Suppose that we have not any provision for determining a controversy that does arise out of action on that day and we are without any law, are we any better off? Does the Senator go upon the principle that there will be no controversy if you do not have any court to decide it on the spot? That seems to be the logic of the argument; and therefore, if you do not provide for allowing a State to find out who its electors are that it has the right to appoint in case there is a dispute, then there is safety for the country, because, as the logic I will suppose is, there will never be any controversy in the State as to who are electors if you do not have the tribunal which is proposed! That I think is not sound logic.

We all know from experience and from the philosophy of human affairs that in a great many instances an election will be so close or will have in it such elements as to raise a fair doubt, to say nothing of the unfair ones and contrivances, but a fair doubt and question as to what the voice of the State has been on that day. It always occurs at elections in every State, in every county, in every municipality everywhere. What are you to do? You cannot settle it on that day; that is physically impossible. You must take, therefore, whatever grief there is in the fact that in some particular State on a day when electors have been appointed it is not absolutely determined which of two sets of candidates have been elected. Will it be any better to postpone that controversy until immediately before the new President is to take his place than it will be to allow the State itself, in its own way, by a preordained law and regulation, to eliminate the false from the true, and to certify only those electors who according to its laws, its own will, will thus have determined to have been chosen? That is what the Constitution says, that is the will of the State in this choice, and the fourth section only provides a means of ascertaining the will of the State in case of dispute, and then respect it; and then, of course, if there is no dispute, you get the will of the State as you do in the case of States nine times out of ten without any question whatever.

My honorable friend says then that another part of the bill is very dangerous, because there is conferred upon Congress, or recognized in it, the power of determining controversies that have not been determined in the States, and that party spirit will guide every determination. Suppose that to be true, what better can you do? You must elect a President; you must count the vote; and if the question arises on the counting of the vote somebody must decide it for the time being. Suppose you have not any law, then you are in a state of chaos. Neither House may be able to agree at the moment upon precisely the rules it will adopt for itself; or if each House is able to agree upon something and does not vote down everything, its neighbor, its correlative court, the other judge of the election, if you style it so, may not agree to that; and you gain nothing, therefore, by having no law in the place of some law, although you may say that party spirit will enter into it. So it will, Mr. President. Party spirit will enter into everything to a degree, but my honorable friend is mistaken when he says that on every occasion party spirit will govern the judgment of the two Houses, or govern the judgment of a tribunal that is called upon to decide the question that is remitted to it. If the Senator from Florida will read the proceedings of the electoral commission, as it was called, he will see that there were some questions which were critical indeed where party spirit was not strong enough to divide by party lines the votes of the members of that tribunal. If my honorable friend will look at the records of the two Houses on that late memorable occasion, upon cases that the tribunal did not pass upon, he will also see that party spirit was not strong enough and coercive enough to move members to vote according to party interests, because there were one or two or three or more cases of that character where the votes of democrats and republicans concurred in saying that a particular objection was or was not valid. It is to be said to the credit of human nature and of patriotism, that it is only in questions that come very near the line and where it is difficult for the intellect to decide between opposing considerations and arguments that this party bias which possesses us all really has control. But be it much or little, it is everywhere, and the best that legislation and government can do is to provide by preceding laws and arrangements for such just settlement as is possible of disputed questions; and under the Constitution, if we believe in the rights of States at all, to have them settled as the Constitution intended they should be settled, by the State itself as a part of determining finally who are the agents who are to express its voice in the choice of President.

Mr. WHYTE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will allow me to say so, although that motion is not debatable, I will state that my only objection to it is that other Senators desire to speak and it is desirable to get on with this bill to a determination at the earliest period of time consistent with the convenience of Senators and with our other duties. A Senator has given notice that to-morrow he wishes to address the Senate upon another subject, and I should hope that the Senate would proceed with diligence in the disposition of this subject until it is finally disposed of. If some Senator who wishes to speak is not ready to speak to-day, of course I should hardly be disposed to insist at this moment that he should be crowded out, but I wish to have the Senate understand, if it will support me in it, that this bill is to be the business of the Senate until it is disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HOAR in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at two o'clock and thirty-seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 10, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EPIDEMIC DISEASES.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of the following select committee in pursuance of a resolution of the House adopted yesterday: Mr. CASEY YOUNG, of Tennessee; Mr. RANDALL L. GIBSON, of Louisiana; Mr. CHARLES E. HOOKER, of Mississippi; Mr. JOHN GOODE, of Virginia; Mr. JULIAN HARTRIDGE, of Georgia; Mr. LEOPOLD MORSE, of Massachusetts; Mr. JAMES A. GARFIELD, of Ohio; Mr. ALFRED C. HARMER, of Pennsylvania; and Mr. SIMEON B. CHITTENDEN, of New York.

VACANCIES ON COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER also announced the following appointments to fill vacancies on the committees named respectively:

Committee on Public Lands, Mr. THOMAS J. MAJORS, of Nebraska.

Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings, Mr. JOHN M. BAILEY, of New York.

Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, Mr. JOHN K. LUTTRELL, of California.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SINGLETON. I rise to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

IRON-CLAD MONITOR MONADNOC.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution calling for executive information. I have conferred with gentlemen on both sides of the House, and I think there will be no objection.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to communicate to this House the occasion of the delay in the completion of the work on the iron-clad double-turreted monitor Monadnoc at Vallejo, California; also whether damages have been or are being sustained through reason of said delay, with the nature, extent, and amount of said damages.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

Mr. LUTTRELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SINGLETON. I will yield to my colleague, [Mr. HOOKER.]

Mr. HOOKER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 726 merely for the purpose of referring it to the appropriate committee, the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER. The bill cannot be found, and the matter will go over for the present.

Mr. FINLEY. I ask the gentleman from Mississippi to yield to me.

Mr. PAGE. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill; and pending that motion I move all general debate be closed in five minutes.

GENEVA AWARD BILL.

Mr. KNOTT. Mr. Speaker, before that question is put I desire to make an inquiry. The special order for this morning immediately after the reading of the Journal is the consideration of the Geneva award bill, and I would inquire whether that bill will lose any of its present privileges should the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi prevail?

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. KNOTT. Or will it go over until to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. It will go over exactly as it is, as it is a special order from day to day, as the Chair is advised.

Mr. KNOTT. I desire specifically to know whether it will come up to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. It will come up whenever the House is disposed to take it up. The Chair has uniformly recognized the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider appropriation bills.

Mr. KNOTT. I understand that. I only desire the Geneva award bill shall hold its place with its present privileges.

The SPEAKER. It will hold it.

Mr. KNOTT. My present indisposition may require me to leave the Hall.

The SPEAKER. By going to the consideration of the appropriation bills the Geneva award bill is only temporarily postponed.

Mr. KNOTT. If there be no appropriation bills intervening it is the understanding, then, that the Geneva award bill shall come up with its present privileges.

The SPEAKER. There is no understanding the House can agree to now. It will come up with its full rights.

Mr. CLYMER. I wish to give notice that as soon as the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill is disposed of I will call up the Navy appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Kentucky as antagonizing any of the appropriation bills.

Mr. KNOTT. Certainly not.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. WOOD. I ask the gentleman from Mississippi to yield to me to offer the usual resolutions from the Committee of Ways and Means for the distribution of the President's message to the appropriate committees. It will give rise, I think, to no objection and will be disposed of in five minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. It might be agreed that the resolution should be introduced and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that when the House resolves itself into committee the resolution distributing the President's message shall first be disposed of, and then that the committee shall proceed to the consideration of the appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, after the appropriation bill has been disposed of, or if he prefers it the Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York now.

Mr. WOOD. I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, and take the floor after the appropriation bill has been disposed of.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of taking up and considering a bill (H. R. No. 5312) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; and pending that motion I move all general debate be closed in five minutes.

The motions were agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House, all general debate is closed on the pending consular and diplomatic appropriation bill in five minutes.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move that the first reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Chairman, I have no speech to make. The bill now before the committee is as it passed the House at the last session before it went to the Senate. It will be remembered its provisions were then fully discussed, the discussion occupying some days, and therefore I take it that the bill embodies the sense of this House. It is not, however, the law as it was enacted after it came from the conference committee, the Senate having added a great many amendments, but it is the bill passed by the House before it went to the Senate. Its provisions have been discussed not only at the last session, but at previous sessions of Congress.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman having charge of this bill to the fact that a communication from the Secretary of State to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs was ordered to be printed and recommitted to that committee. That committee has had the subject under consideration, but has not had time to examine and ascertain whether the Committee on Appropriations has complied to any extent with the request of the Secretary of State.

Mr. SINGLETON. I would suggest to the gentleman from West Virginia that all this information will be developed in the reading of the bill. There are several requests made by the Secretary of State with which we have complied, and there are several with which we have not. I call for the reading of the bill by paragraphs.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment, and read as follows:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the objects hereinafter expressed, namely:

For salaries of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Great Britain, France, Germany, and Russia, at $15,000 each, $60,000.

Mr. HALE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 10, strike out "$15,000" and insert "$17,500," and instead of "$60,000" insert "$70,000."

Mr. HALE. I offer this amendment, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of bringing the bill back to the status where it was left last year by the consent of the two Houses. I have no doubt that in the end that will be the result this year. I do not believe that the House now is prepared to enter into any new contest upon these diplomatic salaries, and I believe it is better that this body should take the responsibility and put the salaries where they were agreed upon last year, so as not to leave it a matter of arrangement between the two Houses. The salaries for these first-class missions have been for years $17,500 each. Last year the House entered into the contest, seeking to cut them down to $15,000, but in the end had to give up the contest and let the salaries go at the old rate. The conference committee so finally reported and were upheld by the vote of the House.

Now my friend, the chairman of the subcommittee, has deemed it better to go back to that old contest and renew it and send the bill over to the Senate as we sent it before. My way would be to take the bill as it was finally adjusted last year, leaving the salaries at $17,500, and not renew the contest. That is the whole story about it. I do not need to go into the arguments, because they have been offered repeatedly and are fresh in the minds of members. It is simply a question of policy in the run of the business of the House and the Senate. I do not think the House is ready to go into and maintain these old conflicts that were finally settled by compromise last year. I therefore urge this amendment to leave the amount as it was settled last year.

Mr. SINGLETON. This question has been discussed very fully more than once in this House, and it has been determined again and again that these salaries ought to be reduced. The gentleman from Maine says that perhaps this will be the end of the matter after the bill shall have gone to a committee of conference. I am not one of those who believe in surrendering to the enemy until the proper time comes. If it be true that the Senate still insists upon retaining these salaries at $17,500 and we can make no compromise with them, it may be possible that will be the result; but the gentleman has no right to anticipate such a result.

There is another reason of some weight which should be considered. I find that during the year 1877—and I take the figures from the report of the Fifth Auditor—in France the whole expenses of the mission, including chargés, second secretaries, &c., were $27,815.78. I find that during the last year the salaries and expenses at the same court amounted to $30,585.42.

Now, sir, if we put these salaries at $17,500 a year, and allow these contingent expenses, or whatever expenses there may be, to accumulate from year to year at the rate of $2,000 or $3,000, it seems to me there is no landing-place for us. I do not know where we shall tie up. I am disposed, therefore, to object to what I believe to be extravagance and at least to this increase of expenditure at these courts.

This is not only true of the mission to France but is true of first-class missions at other points. How is it that year after year these expenses are increased, as we find them in the instance I have mentioned, at the rate of two thousand or three thousand a year? We must put on the drags. The time has come when we must check this extravagance on the part of our foreign ministers as well as our officers at home. I therefore am in favor of leaving the salaries as this House placed them at the last session, at $15,000 a year, giving the ministers their first and second secretaries of legation. The second secretaries were omitted last year on the motion of the Senate conferees and not by the action of the House. We are now willing to restore them, and we allow as salaries for the ministers the $15,000 which this House in its wisdom deemed to be sufficient. If it shall come at last that we cannot help ourselves, we will have to yield something to Senate exactions, and as gracefully as possible; but I am not in favor of this House yielding up any view or opinion it entertains in regard to any subject simply because the Senate may choose to differ from it.

Mr. MONROE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Mississippi whether the second secretaries are restored in this bill.

Mr. SINGLETON. They are.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend by striking out the last word. I wish to make a suggestion, not in the spirit of antagonism. I think every man familiar with the business of the Appropriations Committee recognizes this fact, that it is a very dangerous thing in the practice of this House to leave a very large proportion of our legislative work in the hands of conference committees, especially as conference committees are always pressed for time in the last days of the session. Now we have before us a bill in regard to which the gentleman in charge of it very plainly intimates we shall be compelled to recede before we get through from the main position taken in it, leaving the points to be finally adjusted in the end by conference committees.

Mr. SINGLETON. Oh, no!

Mr. GARFIELD. That really leaves all of our work here a sort of moot discussion, knowing as we do most certainly that what we are now passing will not be the final shape of the law, but that it is to be left to a committee of six gentlemen at the last end of the session and in the night to determine practically the legislation on this whole subject. Now I do not think the House of Representatives ought to convert itself into a moot debating club, to go through with the form of passing the consular bill, when we know that will not be its final shape.

I want to say another thing. So far as I have studied the current of public thought and of political feeling in this country, no feeling has shown itself more strongly than the tendency of the public mind in the past few months. The man who attempts to get up a political excitement in this country on the old sectional issues will find himself without a party and without support. The man who wants to serve his country must put himself in the line of its leading thought, and that is the restoration of business, trade, commerce, industry, sound political economy, honest money, and honest payment of all obligations. And the man who can add anything in the direction of the accomplishment of any of these purposes is a public benefactor.

Now, among the most important things that lie in this direction is our foreign trade. We have seen it grow up until now we sell abroad more than we buy from abroad by almost $300,000,000. Never in our history has our trade abroad been of such vast proportions and of so great consequence as it is now at the very time when we are discussing this consular and commercial bill. Yet at this time, in view of all this, when we need all our activities in the field of our foreign consulates to take care of this great and growing commerce of the United States, here comes a bill that cuts down deeply, strongly, savagely, unwisely, from what the last House and the last Senate agreed upon and settled after an extended debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will allow me a single moment more. I remember very well the able and learned presentation of this case by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] and at last, after a long struggle, his views prevailed. Now, I hope we will not have the debate upon this subject over again, only to come out at last as we did then. I wish the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr

SINGLETON] would allow this bill to be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations, in order that it may be reported on the basis of the law of the last session.

Mr. SINGLETON. I am glad to hear the gentleman state what he does to-day in regard to the increase of our commerce. It is well known that since the democratic party has had control in this House we have been constantly cutting down expenses of the consular and diplomatic service which we deemed were not necessary, and the cry has been all the while, "You will cripple if not destroy our commerce." Yet, notwithstanding all that, the gentleman says the commerce of the country has continued to increase, showing that our foreign intercourse has not been crippled by the reductions which we have heretofore made.

The gentleman says that we now are cutting down savagely and unwisely. I think he has not examined the bill or he would not have made that declaration. By the law of last year there was appropriated $1,076,135. By the bill now reported the amount is fixed at $1,038,435. That is a very small difference, and not sufficient to make the House determine that it will not hold on to its idea of economy. The House, I think, should insist upon the position it has heretofore taken and keep upon the line which it has established for the past few years. It will not do to say that because the Senate may entertain different views upon the subject, therefore the House must surrender at once. How does the gentleman know that the Senate will not agree to this bill? Has he had any indication of that fact which he can lay before this House? It may well be supposed that they will yield to the opinion of the House, coming as its members do immediately from the people and representing the popular will more directly than does the Senate. Is it not as reasonable to suppose that they will yield to our opinions as that we must give way to theirs? I hope that the House, having agreed upon this bill at the last session and the session before, (only that we cut a little deeper the first year,) will not back down from its position.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I renew it for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Mississippi a question. Did I understand the gentleman correctly as saying that the reports of the Fifth Auditor showed that the contingent expenses of our foreign missions had increased during the last year?

Mr. SINGLETON. I did not so state. I said that the expenses had increased, but I did not say what expenses. And I referred particularly to the expenses of the mission to France.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It was only the expenses of the mission to France of which the gentleman spoke?

Mr. SINGLETON. That was what I spoke of; but I think the same will be found true in other cases.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I find by examining the report of the Fifth Auditor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, that the contingent expenses of all the foreign missions amounted to $60,401.02. I find by referring to his report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, that the contingent expenses of all the foreign missions amounted to $50,308.78, showing a saving of a little over $10,000 during the last fiscal year in the amount for the contingent expenses.

I hold that this is due to the care with which the Committee on Appropriations perfected the bill on this subject at the last session. I find in reference to the consulates that the contingent expenses for 1877 were $119,988, while for 1878 they are $110,000, showing also a saving during the last year of about $10,000 on contingent expenses.

I trust that the economy thus introduced into the expenditures of the Government will be continued. I do not propose to discuss the main question. At the last session I went over that ground very fully; and last night I did what I very rarely do—I read over my own speech made at the last session on this subject to see whether I had anything to take back; and I do not wish to take back anything I then said.

I believe that the diplomatic expenses of this Government can be largely reduced. I believe that we can dispense with many of the minor missions. I am in favor of doing so. I believe that we can consolidate missions with great advantage; and I think the reform we should attempt in this direction will be appreciated by the country at large. But so long as we maintain missions, so long as they are provided for in our appropriation bills, I am not in favor of inadequate compensation. In the Forty-fourth Congress I stated as the result of my personal examination that the salaries allowed to our foreign ministers were not in my judgment excessive. I repeat that statement now. I think that the sum paid in London and in Paris is not sufficient to meet the legitimate expenses to which the American minister at each of these places is necessarily subjected. I say that no minister in London can by any possibility live within the salary which is now assigned him by law. I am not in favor of an increase; I am in favor of complying with the law as we find it on the statute-book, which allows this minister $17,500. I was not in favor of the proposed reduction at the last session; I am not in favor of it now; but I then expressed the hope, and I now repeat it, that the Committee on Foreign Affairs will in the next Congress (as this is rapidly coming to an end) take up this whole subject, revise the system, improve the means of foreign intercourse, and allow such salaries to those officers who are retained as may enable them to live at foreign ports without degrading the name and the honor of the American people.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SINGLETON. I do not know whether the gentleman from New York intended to controvert what I said in regard to the cost of the mission to France.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I did not.

Mr. SINGLETON. I have before me the report of the Fifth Auditor for the year 1877 and also 1878, and I find, as I have already said, that for 1877 the whole expenses of the mission to France were $27,715, while for the year 1878 these expenses are increased to $30,585.42.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I spoke of the aggregate of all the missions.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn; and the question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

The question being taken, there were—ayes 92, noes 99.

Mr. HALE called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HALE and Mr. SINGLETON were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 98, noes 91.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON. I give notice that I shall ask for a vote on this amendment in the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Spain, Austria, Italy, Brazil, Mexico, Japan, and China, at $10,000 each, $70,000.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend by striking out "$10,000" in the paragraph just read, and inserting "$12,000;" also by striking out "$70,000" and inserting "$84,000." I will take no time in discussing this amendment. It is in the same line as the amendment just adopted.

Mr. SINGLETON. I will simply say that the bill on this subject as passed at the last session reduced these salaries from $12,000 to $10,000.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HALE, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 83, noes 92.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Chili and Peru, at $8,000 each, $16,000 each.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend this paragraph by striking out after "$16,000" the word "each," which is evidently a mistake.

Mr. SINGLETON. This amendment is all right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For ministers resident at Sweden and Norway, Turkey, Venezuela, Hawaiian Islands, and the United States of Colombia, at $7,500 each, $37,500.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend the paragraph just read by inserting after Norway the words "Belgium, Netherlands;" also by striking out at the end of the paragraph "$37,500" and inserting "$52,500." I cannot understand why the ministers to these two countries are omitted in this bill. When I inquired about this matter of the gentleman who reports the bill, I understood him to say that the bill left these ministers as they are under the present law; but I may have misunderstood him. Our commercial relations with Belgium and the Netherlands are as important as with any other nation in the world. From these countries we have, perhaps, a larger immigration than from any other source, so that in this respect there is more need of a minister than with regard to any other nation. I think that the discussion had last year on this point must have satisfied those who remember it that these are important places and that ministers to them should be retained. I will not prolong the discussion, for I do not think it necessary.

Mr. SINGLETON. I hope this amendment will not prevail. I know that this subject was fully discussed at the last session, and the House determined not to retain these ministers as they were not considered important. We have three or four consuls in Belgium. We have one at Antwerp and one at Brussels at $2,500 each. We have a sixth-class consul at Verviers and one at Liege, at $1,500 each. It is unnecessary we should have a minister at Belgium at all.

Mr. SPARKS. State whether the bill of last year has it in or not?

Mr. SINGLETON. The bill as it passed before going to the Senate?

Mr. SPARKS. Yes.

Mr. SINGLETON. It did not. The law as it passed the House finally did contain it. It was restored by the Senate.

Mr. SPARKS. The law, then, has it in?

Mr. SINGLETON. It has.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 82, noes 83.

Mr. CONGER demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SINGLETON and Mr. CONGER were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 86, noes 91.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salary of chargé d'affaires to Portugal, $5,000.

Mr. MONROE. I offer the following amendment to come in immediately after the thirty-eighth line. I send it up to the Clerk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salary of chargé d'affaires to Greece, $5,000.

Mr. MONROE. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the law which provides for a chargé d'affaires to Greece has never been repealed, but for a year or two past the appropriation for the salary of that officer has been omitted.

I hold in my hand a letter addressed by the Secretary of State to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in which he calls attention to the serious inconvenience which has resulted from the omission to make the proper appropriation for salary of the chargé d'affaires to Greece, and I do not know that I can do any better than to send up to the Clerk and have read the few sentences from the letter of the Secretary which refer to that matter. They seem to me to make it plain we ought to restore that appropriation, and hence I have offered this amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The renewal of the appropriation formerly made of $5,000 for the salary of a chargé d'affaires to Greece is respectfully but earnestly requested. At this juncture in the affairs of Eastern Europe, when the hopes of peace and good-will based on the arrangement of Berlin may at any time be dispelled by reason of the evident discontent of the Greeks, the presence of a responsible diplomatic representative at Athens is deemed to be very necessary.

Indeed, so intensely was the Department convinced of this necessity that it has requested the incumbent of the mission to continue at his post and discharge his diplomatic functions under his appointment until such time as Congress might revise its late action in failing to make an appropriation for his salary. This Mr. Read has consented to do at much personal inconvenience and loss. In addition to the usual duties of his office, the chargé d'affaires has recently been instructed to open negotiations with the Greek government for the conclusion of an extradition treaty with that country, the only one of the European Mediterranean powers with which no treaty exists to that end. I trust that your committee will take such steps as will restore the appropriation for the mission to Greece, in the interest of the public service and of the development of our Mediterranean trade.

Mr. MONROE. I have only to add that this appropriation is reported to Congress in the regular estimates from the Department of State; and in addition to furnishing those estimates the Secretary of State, on his responsibility as an officer, takes this further opportunity to urge upon Congress the importance of the restoration of this salary.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Chairman, Greece is an example in point of the remark which I made when I addressed the House a few moments ago. It is an inconsiderable power; it has no political weight in the affairs of the world; and whatever the treaty of Berlin may do in Europe, it cannot in any wise have any effect on the interests of this country. Whether the area of Greece shall be enlarged by the addition to her northern borders of a portion of the plains of Macedonia, or otherwise, can be of no consequence to us. We maintain a minister already at Turkey. During the whole time of the Turkish war that minister was endeavoring to communicate some intelligence of value to this Government. His dispatches have been published; I have read such as the Secretary of State has given to the world, and I find that in no case did he ever succeed in communicating anything to this Government which was of any consequence to us or which had not been anticipated by the newspapers.

In regard to Greece, there is no center of political intelligence at that point. If we have commercial interests there let them be taken care of by consuls. Our trade is inconsiderable, our political relations a nullity; and as to the present incumbent I wish to speak of him with due respect; but nevertheless if gentlemen will take the trouble to read his dispatches they will come to the conclusion the less we have of them the better the country will be served.

I therefore oppose the appropriation as being exactly contrary to the policy which I think ought to be pursued by this Government, the maintenance at most of two or three legations at prominent courts, subordinating all other interests to their control, and protecting such commercial interests as we may have by the enlargement of our consular system.

Mr. BACON. I trust very sincerely the amendment will prevail. If my memory serves me the United States was the first nation to recognize the independence of Greece, and we have always taken the deepest interest in the fortunes of that country and have always maintained relations with it. Mr. Reed, our minister, a most accomplished gentleman, has remained there at his own expense on account of the importance of the station, and now all that is asked is that we restore the mission as it was before. I hope for the honor of the country and the reputation of Greece, her name and fame, we shall vote this small appropriation, especially as the Secretary of State has urged it upon Congress.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 48, noes 82.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CAIN. I move to amend by inserting at line 34 "$4,000" instead of "$2,500;" so that the paragraph will read:

For minister resident and consul-general to Liberia, $4,000.

Mr. SINGLETON. We cannot go back. We have passed that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee had passed the paragraph, but the Chair hopes there will be no objection to the gentleman from South Carolina recurring to it, as he is not in the habit of troubling the House. If there be no objection, the Chair will entertain the amendment.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] objected to going back.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to returning to the paragraph indicated by the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. SINGLETON. I object.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following paragraph:

For salaries of the secretaries to the legations at Austria, Italy, Mexico, and Spain, at $1,800 each, $7,200.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I should like to call the attention of my friend the chairman of the subcommittee to an amendment which I think had better be inserted at this point. It is as follows:

In line 46, after the word "Mexico," insert "Brazil;" and in line 47 strike out "$7,200" and insert "$9,000;" so that it will read:

For salaries of the secretaries to the legations at Austria, Italy, Mexico, Brazil, and Spain, at $1,800 each, $9,000.

It will be remembered that this matter was thoroughly discussed in the House at the last session. It was proposed to devolve the duties of the secretary of legation at Brazil on the consul-general. My friend from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] who had himself been consul-general at Rio Janeiro made it so clear that such a consolidation of duties was impossible, and the necessity of a secretary at Brazil in consequence of the increasing trade is so obvious, that I suggest to my friend the chairman of the subcommittee that he should accept the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. SPARKS. There is a consul-general there now.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The honorable gentleman from Ohio made it plain at the last session that the consul-general could not perform the duties of secretary of legation, the duties of the secretary being at the court in a town thirty-five or forty miles north of Rio, while the consul-general has to stay in Rio. I moved at the last session to strike out that item but I am now convinced that it is a great damage to the public interest not to have a secretary of legation at Brazil.

Mr. SINGLETON. I agree fully with the gentleman from New York as to this matter. The efforts we are making now to get the Brazilian trade and to encourage the friendly relations between the two countries make it important we should adopt this amendment, and I accept it very cheerfully.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For salaries of the second secretaries to the legations at Great Britain, France, and Germany, at $2,000 each, $6,000.

Mr. FORT. I offer the following amendment:

In line 49 strike out the words "and Germany" and insert the word "and" after "Great Britain;" and in line 50 strike out "$6,000" and insert "$4,000;" so that it will read:

For salaries of the second secretaries of legations at Great Britain and France, at $2,000 each, $4,000.

I offer this amendment not merely upon my own judgment, but from having learned from those who have had much experience in foreign service that this second secretary is not necessary; and I call upon the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to permit a letter addressed to him by Hon. E. B. Washburne to be read, which I think will show this office is not necessary.

Mr. ATKINS. I concur most fully with the gentleman from Illinois in the motion he has made, and I most cheerfully submit the letter of Mr. Washburne. I served with that gentleman here twenty years ago, and I believe him to be an eminently practical man and have great confidence in his judgment. I think the amendment is a proper one.

The Clerk read as follows:

My own judgment is that a second secretary is needed in London, but at no other legation. There was never the least necessity for a second secretary at Berlin. A second secretary there was as absolutely useless as a minister to Greece.

E. B. W.

Mr. SINGLETON. I certainly shall not object to the striking out of that portion of the paragraph as it comes from the other side of the House. I wish to say, however, that the Secretary of State, Mr. Evarts, has laid before the committee a voluminous correspondence between himself and the minister at Berlin, in which he insists that he cannot get along unless he has this second secretary. The Secretary of State has very earnestly requested that this office be continued, and that an appropriation be made to pay the party who fills it. But if it shall be deemed proper by the friends of the Secretary upon the statement of Mr. Washburne to strike this out, as it is in the line of economy, I do not feel myself at liberty to object.

Mr. FORT. I am informed that the principal secretary can attend to all the duties very easily.

Mr. SPARKS. I ask my colleague if his amendment covers France?

Mr. FORT. No, sir. It only proposes to strike out the office of second secretary of legation in Germany.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to have read an extract from the letter of Secretary Evarts on this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

I beg leave to add my own earnest representations to those of the ministers for the continuance of the second secretaries at London, Paris, and Berlin.

The complex details and great amount of the work devolving upon those legations, and the need of responding to repeated demands on the part of the American traveling public in those frequented capitals make the services of a second secretary imperatively necessary, and it is believed that the performance of the labor of the first-class missions with the aid of a single secretary is utterly impossible. Had it not been for the generous abnegation of the present incumbents in remaining at their posts without compensation, it is certain that the utility of those three legations would have been seriously impaired during the past five months. The failure to provide compensation for second secretaries in the current appropriation act was not in consequence of any suggestion on the part of this Department, and had the proposal to make such a change been intimated to it, I am satisfied that the views of the Department and the needs of the public service would have prevailed to prevent the omission.

Mr. CLYMER. I have very great respect, in common doubtless with every member of this House, for the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Washburne, upon whose suggestion it is proposed to drop from this bill the second secretary of legation at Berlin. But it does seem to me that we may be acting inconsiderately. It cannot be that that gentleman has the same knowledge of the wants of that legation as the very estimable gentleman, Mr. Bayard Taylor, who is the minister to that court. From my knowledge of Mr. Taylor I do not think it possible that he would make a solemn statement to the Department of State in regard to the necessity for this second secretary unless such a necessity really existed.

When we consider the enormous German population of this country, constantly applying to the legation at Berlin for information in reference to many matters relating to person and property which affect them here and there, I can well see that at no other court in Europe may there be such an amount of correspondence as at Berlin. I would therefore rather be inclined to respect the judgment of our minister there than the judgment of one who can have no other knowledge in reference to it than from hearsay and by reason of his own experience as minister to France.

I do not wish to be extravagant in regard to the public service, as every one will bear me witness. Yet I may say that in regard to so inconsiderable a sum as we may appropriate here I can understand that by depriving the mission of it we may be doing great injustice to vast numbers of people, and impose labors that it may be inconvenient and almost impossible for one secretary to perform. I therefore beg the House not to act hastily upon this matter, and not to strike out this appropriation without some better information than we now have.

The question was taken upon the amendment moved by Mr. FORT, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For the consuls-general at Vienna, Frankfort, Rome, and Constantinople, each, $2,500; $10,000.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move to amend the paragraph just read by inserting after the word "Rome" the word "Athens," so that we may have a consul-general in Greece; also, by striking out at the end of the paragraph "$10,000" and inserting "$12,500."

Mr. SINGLETON. I have no objection to that; I think we should have some representative in Greece. Upon an examination of the bill I find that no provision is made for a representative in that country.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

SCHEDULE C.

Class VII.—At $1,000 per annum.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Ceylon, Gaspé Basin, Windsor, (Nova Scotia.)

Mr. HALE. I desire to move an amendment in regard to three different consulates now existing, and to which I think there will be no objection. I do not propose to create any new consulates, but to restore some that this bill proposes to abolish. And I will say to the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. SINGLETON] that I will offer no other amendments after this. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read the words:

Venice, Nantz, Stettin.

The question was taken upon the amendment moved by Mr. HALE; and upon a division it was not agreed to—ayes 63, noes 80.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. No. 1435) authorizing the appointment of Dr. Junius L. Powell an assistant surgeon in the United States Navy.

The message further announced that the Senate requested the House of Representatives to transmit to the Senate a copy of the testimony of one James E. Anderson relative to Hon. STANLEY MATTHEWS, a member of the Senate from the State of Ohio, understood to have been taken before one of the committees of the House of Representatives.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session, and proceeded with the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5312) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following:

For expenses of shipping and discharging seamen at Liverpool, London, Cardiff, Belfast, and Hamburg, to be allotted as may seem proper to the Secretary of State, $6,000: Provided, That the fees collected at these ports for shipping and discharging seamen shall be paid into the Treasury as required by law.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the President is requested to revise the tariff of consular fees and prescribe such rates as will make them conform as nearly as may be to the fees charged by other commercial nations for similar services.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It is well known, Mr. Chairman, that American ships have very nearly disappeared from the face of the ocean. It is one of the great problems which Congress must solve at some future day, by what process those ships are to be restored. For myself I have no hesitation in saying that I think the true remedy is to authorize American citizens to buy ships in the cheapest markets, whether at home or abroad.

Under international law and under treaties, Germans, Norwegians, Swedes, and all other nations may go to the cheapest markets for ships, bring them into our ports, carry away our products, and bring back return cargoes. The only human being on the face of the habitable globe who is prohibited from going where he can get a cheap ship is the American citizen. The remedy is is our hand, and that is to permit our citizens to buy ships where they can buy them most cheaply. But there are minor difficulties which we can correct here and now. I have taken some trouble to ascertain the petty exactions which are imposed upon American ship-owners in the pursuit of their business; exactions which are imposed by no other commercial nation of the world. I hold in my hand an original bill presented by the consul of the United States at Liverpool to the captain of the American ship Hamilton Fish, almost the last of the old liners left upon the ocean. I find that that bill for consular fees amounts to £21 2*s*. If the same service had been rendered by a British consul to a British ship under the British tariff of fees the bill would have amounted to £4 12*s*. 6*d*.

Therefore American ship-masters, and of course American commerce, are subjected by our Government to charges at least five times as great as those charged against the British ship by the British consul. Now, it is simply impossible that American commerce can sustain itself against such discriminations imposed by its own Government. Under the law the President of the United States has the power to correct these discriminations. In my remarks at the last session I called attention to this matter; but nothing was done in regard to it. It is true that the question was referred to, not in the bill, but only in a speech; still I think the suggestion was so important and obvious that it ought to have attracted attention. I now ask this House to put the request in the form of an amendment to this bill. It appropriates no money; it only calls the attention of the Chief Executive to a grievance to which a commercial nation ought not to be subjected for one hour.

I hold in my hand the American fee-list, by which it will be seen that one hundred and twenty-nine different acts are charged for in sums varying from $2.50 to twenty-five cents. Here also is the British fee-list, comprising thirty-nine items, not one of which is more than 10*s*., and nearly all of which are 1*s*. or 2*s*.

These facts are known at the State Department; they are known to the Government; they are published in all the consular regulations; and I hope that in thus calling attention to the subject we may awaken the administrators of this Government to a sense of their duty in regard to the shipping and the commerce of this country.

The amendment of Mr. HEWITT, of New York, was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For allowance to widows or heirs of deceased diplomatic and consular officers for the time that would be necessarily occupied in making the transit from the post of duty of the deceased to his residence in the United States, $5,000. And the salaries provided in this act for the officers within named respectively shall be in full for the annual salaries thereof from and after the 1st day of July, 1878; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move to amend by striking out, in line 331, "1878" and inserting "1879."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I wish to move an amendment, to which the gentleman in charge of this bill will, I think, promptly accede. In the Book of Estimates I find submitted the following estimate:

Revising and editing consular regulations:

For expenses of revising and editing the consular regulations, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be available immediately.

Then follows this note:

NOTE.—The existing diplomatic and consular regulations having been rendered inaccurate by reason of subsequent legislation, decisions of the Departments, and changes in treaties, it is deemed very desirable that a new edition should be published at once.

Now I move the following amendment, to come in after the paragraph last read by the Clerk:

For expenses of revising and editing the consular regulations, $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be available immediately.

I think that, in connection with the amendment recently adopted as to consular fees, this amendment is absolutely indispensable.

Mr. SINGLETON. I think there can be no objection to this amendment. If these regulations are to be revised, it is necessary that we should appropriate money to pay for the work. I therefore make no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For diplomatic and consular service, to be expended in the discretion of the President, $20,000.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$20,000" and inserting the following:

Seventy thousand dollars: Provided, That $50,000 of said sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be used by the President, in his discretion, for the purpose of negotiating such treaties with Mexico, the Central and South American states as will promote and facilitate the commerce and trade of the United States with said countries.

Mr. SINGLETON. I make a point of order on this amendment. It does not properly belong to this bill.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I trust that my friend from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] will not insist on this point of order. If he does, I should like to be heard upon it for one moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Tennessee upon the point of order.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The paragraph as it stands in this bill provides:

For diplomatic and consular service, to be expended in the discretion of the President, $20,000.

My amendment proposes simply to increase the amount of this appropriation, and in increasing it directs how a portion of the fund shall be used. I submit that it is germane, that it is pertinent, that it is within the line of the law and within the line of the bill itself.

Now I hope my friend from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] will indulge me just one moment on the merits of the question.

Mr. SINGLETON. Certainly. I do not wish to press the point of order until I have heard what the gentleman has to say.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Then, with the indulgence of the Chair, I would like to direct the attention of the House for one moment to the important subject indicated in the amendment I have had the honor to propose for the consideration of the committee. It contemplates that the efforts of the executive department of the Government should be directed to opening and increasing the trade of the United States with Mexico, the Central American states, and the South American states.

Every gentleman on this floor is familiar with the astonishing fact that this country is now by mutiplied millions producing more than our people can consume. We present to the world the astonishing fact that our exports largely exceed our imports. And it is a fact that our constituents at home appreciate that for their products they get but little return. And why? Because their products are put upon the markets of the world at prices dictated by the purchasers. With markets open to us and open to our industries, with fields of enterprise and trade, it is to be expected our industries will then receive a commensurate return or reward. The legislative department of the Government cannot do it of itself, and it behooves the executive department to aid the industries of the country in opening those markets.

When we come, Mr. Chairman, to look abroad for one moment——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Tennessee to be discussing the question whether this amendment is in order or not.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I understood I was speaking by the indulgence of the Chair and by the consent of my friend from Mississippi.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair prefers the point of order shall be disposed of first, and then the gentleman can be heard on the merits of the proposition.

Mr. SINGLETON. I must insist on my point of order, but I am willing to hear what the gentleman has to say, and therefore have withdrawn the point of order for a moment.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I had said but a word or two on the point of order and had assumed the Chair and the gentleman from Mississippi were indulging me in a few words on the merits of the question.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the gentleman will proceed, as the Chair certainly has no objection to such indulgence.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I was about saying, when we come to look at the trade of those countries with which, so to speak, I invite intercourse, the legislative department of the Government should clothe the executive department with the means of opening that intercourse; that when we come to look at the trade of those countries the fact is presented that out of a trade of nearly $600,000,000 in value at this time, although they are our next-door neighbors and although we should command their trade, yet the fact is the United States does not possess one-fourth of that amount. And I say, although there is demand for our agricultural products, for our agricultural implements, for our manufacturing wealth, it is yet reserved for other and more distant countries to supply that demand. We have the means, we have the ability; in fact we do supply that demand, but in so doing we make use of another country, to whom is given our carrying trade. As we stand to-day at the very borders of Mexico, that country whose wealth and industry are open to us now, counted and represented in our exports by from seven to eight millions of dollars, the time is not far distant when, with proper commercial relations, the value of that trade would be worth $150,000,000 to $250,000,000 to our industries and our labor. It is an empire of wealth, and it behooves the statesmanship of this country to assume a control—a control not by conquest or coercion of any kind, but by commercial intercourse. There we stand with our labor and enterprise, railroad, mining, and otherwise, to-day at the threshold of Mexico, ready to cross its border in friendly relations, needing but the aid of our own Government to secure that protection of American labor and enterprise to have them enter there. It is a subject of high statesmanship on the part of our Government, and this is the opportunity, the auspicious moment, for that work.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Chairman, I concur with the gentleman from Tennessee in all he has said as to the importance of this commerce, but I think it is a question which belongs more properly to the Committee on Commerce. That committee should take this matter into consideration and frame a bill with all the details looking to the accomplishment of the object the gentleman has set forth. I must persist in my point of order that the amendment is not germane to the matter under consideration. We have our minister and chargés and consuls there, and I cannot understand why this amendment is necessary.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. One word in reply. For what purpose is $20,000 to be used? It is put at the discretion of the President. That is the law; that is the precedent heretofore. My friend proposes to continue it in this bill. Why not? If $20,000 be legal, right, and proper, why will not $50,000 be also legal, right, and proper, or $70,000 or $100,000? I propose instead of $20,000 to make it $70,000. If we can put in $20,000 why cannot we put in $70,000? If the one is in order certainly the other is in order. The only point is that I propose by the amendment to direct how a portion of it shall be used. Is it out of order, I say, in voting $20,000 to direct the mode and manner in which it shall be used and for what purpose it shall be used?

I submit, whether you look to the rules of common sense or to the bill itself, that the proposed amendment is in order.

Mr. SINGLETON. The $20,000 is paid at the discretion of the President for the purpose of assisting the carrying on properly our consular and diplomatic intercourse with the world; not for the purpose of establishing commercial relations. The gentleman from Tennessee proposes to introduce an entirely new subject in this bill. I must insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide the point of order raised by the gentleman from Mississippi. The provision of the existing law which the pending bill proposes to re-enact is as follows:

For diplomatic and consular service, to be expended in the discretion of the President, $20,000.

The amendment proposes, first, to strike out "$20,000" and insert "$70,000." That portion of the amendment is in order unquestionably; because, this being an appropriation already authorized by law, it in is order to increase it or diminish it at the discretion of the committee. The other portion of the amendment is a proviso to the effect that $50,000 of the money appropriated shall be expended in a particular way. It simply directs the manner in which a portion of this appropriation shall be expended, and is, in the opinion of the Chair, germane and in order. The point of order is therefore overruled. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SINGLETON. I hope the amendment will be voted down. It certainly is a very unusual course to set the President of the United States to making treaties with foreign powers and to put $50,000 in his hands for that purpose. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will get at his idea and carry it out in some other way. I do not think this is exactly the mode which ought to be pursued.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move that the committee rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 5312) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had instructed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. Are separate votes desired on the amendments?

Mr. SINGLETON. I desire a separate vote on the first amendment.

Mr. HALE. I hope my friend will not take up time unnecessarily by calling the yeas and nays on that little amendment.

Mr. EDEN. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. HALE. There is another appropriation bill ready for the House to proceed with.

Mr. SINGLETON. I think it my duty to insist upon a vote on this amendment that we may know how to act on it in committee of conference.

Mr. ATKINS. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALE. Why waste so much time over a little amendment?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HALE. Will the Chair state the amendment?

The SPEAKER. The effect of the amendment is to increase the pay of the ministers to Great Britain, France, Germany, and Russia $2,500 each.

Mr. HALE. Or rather to restore their pay to what it is now; and in the Committee of the Whole the amendment was carried.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 107, nays 117, not voting 67; as follows:

Mr. BAILEY. I am paired with Mr. WILLIS, of New York. If he were present, I should vote "ay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The remaining amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REFUNDING THE PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. WOOD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the bill (H. R. No. 5477) to authorize the issue of certificates of deposit in aid of the refunding of the public debt; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. WOOD, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That so much of the President's message and accompanying documents as relates to the revenues and expenditures, to the sinking fund, the issuing of certificates of deposit, and the public debt, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means; that so much as relates to appropriations be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; that so much as relates to the business of the Supreme Court be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; that so much as relates to our foreign affairs be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; that so much as relates to the yellow-fever epidemic be referred to such committee as may be appointed upon that subject; that so much as relates to the Indian affairs be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; that so much as relates to the Army be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; that so much as relates to coinage be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures; that so much as relates to the postal affairs be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads; that so much as relates to naval affairs, to the Committee on Naval Affairs; that so much as relates to agriculture, to the Committee on Agriculture; that so much as relates to education, to the Committee on Education and Labor; that so much as relates to the Library of Congress, to the Joint Committee on the Library; that so much as relates to the District of Columbia be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia; that so much as relates to the Hot Springs reservation be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; and that so much as refers to the alleged disturbances and irregularities in the recent congressional elections be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, except that portion relating to the appropriation of money, which shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WOOD. The President's message having been referred to the Committee of the Whole, I move that the resolution just read be also referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOOD. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the President's message.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the President's message.

Mr. WOOD. The committee has now under consideration the message of the President and the resolution just referred to it by the House for distributing the message. As that resolution has just been read to the House, it is not necessary that it be again read. If no gentleman desires to make any remarks, or to move any amendment to the resolution, I move that the committee now rise and report the resolution to the House with the recommendation that the same be adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLOUNT reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the annual message of the President, and had directed him to report to the House a resolution providing for its distribution and to recommend that the same be adopted.

Mr. WOOD. I move the previous question upon the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. WOOD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLYMER. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the naval appropriation bill, and pending that motion I move that all general debate upon the bill be limited to five minutes.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The motion to go into Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. No. 5313) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes. All debate upon this bill by order of the House has been limited to five minutes.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask unanimous consent that the first and formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLYMER. I have but very few explanations of this bill to make to this committee. It is substantially the bill as it became a law at the last session. It is my pleasure to state to the committee that the estimates of the Secretary of the Navy for the ensuing fiscal year were less than $40,000 greater than the amount appropriated by the bill of last session. In maturing the bill the Committee on Appropriations were enabled, without detriment to the service and with the concurrence of the Navy Department, to reduce the amount asked for by the sum of $133,134.75. The law of last session appropriated the sum of $14,151,603.70. The amount asked for in this bill is $14,018,468.95; making a reduction of the amount which I have already stated. The principal reduction made by this bill is in the Bureau of Clothing and Provisions. The chief items of increase are one of $2,500 for the support of the Naval Academy, and one of about $24,000 for the support and pay of the Marine Corps.

The only change in legislation proposed by this bill is a provision legalizing and authorizing the appointment of a board of visitors at the Naval Academy at Annapolis. Heretofore these visitors have been appointed without warrant of law by the President of the United States. It was thought best by the committee that this practice should be legalized. Hence we have introduced a provision of law precisely similar to that applicable to the Academy at West Point, namely, that the President of the United States shall appoint seven of the visitors, the Speaker of the House three, and the Vice-President of the United States, or the President pro tempore of the Senate, as the case may be, shall appoint two.

I believe that these are the salient points of difference between this bill and the law of last session. It is my pleasure to state to the committee that this bill has received the unanimous approval of the members of the Committee on Appropriations. There is no difference of opinion there, and we trust there will be no difference of opinion here.

If at this stage of the proceedings any gentleman desires to propound any question to me, I will be most happy to answer him, if in my power.

Mr. HALE. I wish to say only that this bill has been very carefully prepared, mainly by the gentleman in charge of it, [Mr. CLYMER.] I was one of the subcommittee charged with the preparation of this bill. I believe it has already been arranged satisfactorily to the Department, and there is no portion of the bill to which I for one, representing the minority of the Committee on Appropriations, propose to offer any amendment.

I want to say one word in reference to the old and vexed subject of the pay of the Navy, which has troubled this House as it troubled previous Houses for years, and which now has disappeared as an element of strife, because the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] in preparing the bill on this subject last year did what it is always a good thing to do in appropriation bills. Finding himself confronted with deficiencies which had accumulated from year to year, he looked them squarely in the face and recommended the appropriation of money to pay them all, so as to begin a clean score. Hence in preparing the bill this year he has found plain sailing, because of what was then done; and this bill now very nearly runs itself. The old questions do not arise to trouble either him or any of us, because under his arrangement the pay fixed by law can be readily estimated for and never need be disputed by any member. I hope this bill will go through just as reported.

The Clerk, proceeding to read the bill for amendments, read the first paragraph, providing among other things for "thirty passed assistant paymasters" and "twenty assistant paymasters."

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I wish to ask my friend from Pennsylvania whether in appropriating, for instance, for the assistant paymasters in this bill he takes the number authorized by law or the number actually in service.

Mr. CLYMER. The number actually in service.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. CLYMER. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 5313) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same without amendment and with a recommendation that it pass.

Mr. CLYMER demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLYMER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REGISTERED BONDS OF MANHATTAN SAVINGS INSTITUTION.

Mr. McCOOK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5478) to authorize the issue of certain duplicate registered bonds to the Manhattan Savings Institution; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SETTLERS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. PAGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5479) for the relief of settlers on the public lands of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

MARGARET MEYERS.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5480) granting a pension to Margaret Meyers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks leave of absence for to-morrow for those gentlemen of the House who are members of the joint commission on the reorganization of the Army. The object is to allow that commission to sit during the session of the House to-morrow.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

WILLIAM GIBSON.

Mr. MAISH. I ask unanimous consent that a report which has been prepared by the Committee on Naval Affairs upon the memorial of William Gibson, desiring to be placed on the active list of the Navy, be ordered to be printed.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

PAY OF A DECEASED MEMBER.

Mr. MORSE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to pay to the widow of Frank Welch, late member of the Forty-fifth Congress from Nebraska, the sum of money that would have been due him from the date of his death to the end of the Congress to which he was elected.

Mr. MORSE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CENTENNIAL MEMORIAL OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. FINLEY (by request) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee of Accounts:

Whereas in pursuance of the act of Congress approved January 18, 1878, the great seal of the United States has been affixed to the Government centennial memorial entitled "The Administrators of the United States Government at the Beginning of its Second Century," which is now on deposit in the Department of State; and

Whereas the said document is the property of an individual, and is liable to removal at any time: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be directed to incorporate in the sundry civil appropriation bill such sum as may be sufficient to enable the Secretary of State to purchase the said State paper.

J. J. LINTS.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5481) for the relief of J. J. Lints; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, NEW BERNE, NORTH CAROLINA.

On motion of Mr. BROGDEN, by unanimous consent, a bill (S. No. 1338) to provide for the purchase of a building at New Berne, North Carolina, to be used as a post-office and United States court-house, and for the accommodation of United States internal-revenue officials, and for other purposes, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH ANN PORTER.

Mr. CHALMERS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5482) to increase the pension of Elizabeth Ann Porter, widow of William D. Porter, late commodore United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JACOB L. SHINN.

Mr. GUNTER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5483) for the relief of Jacob L. Shinn; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL MONUMENT, PLYMOUTH, MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the petition of E. S. Toby and others, for aid in the completion of the national monument at Plymouth, Massachusetts; and the same was referred to the Joint Committee on the Library.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. TURNER, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for eleven days, on account of important business.

RENEAU FEMALE UNIVERSITY.

On motion of Mr. MANNING, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the memorial of the Mississippi Legislature, asking the endowment of the Reneau Female University, and also papers relative to a national female university, no adverse report having been made.

ASSISTANT MARSHALS NINTH CENSUS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior relative to the pay of assistant marshals for taking the Ninth Census; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Census.

WAR DEPARTMENT—CONTINGENT FUNDS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report of expenditures of the contingent funds of the War Department and bureaus for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

EAST WING WAR, STATE, AND NAVY DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting estimate of an appropriation for furnishing the east wing of War, State and Navy Departments building; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

TESTIMONY OF JAMES E. ANDERSON.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, December 10, 1878.

Resolved, That the House of Representatives be respectfully requested to transmit to the Senate a copy of the testimony of one James E. Anderson, relating to Hon. STANLEY MATTHEWS, a member of the Senate from the State of Ohio, understood to have been taken before one of the committees of the House of Representatives.

Attest:

GEO. C. GORHAM, Secretary,
By WM. E. SPENCER, Chief Clerk.

Mr. POTTER. I move the request of the Senate for that testimony be granted.

The motion was agreed to.

ELLA LONG.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following request from the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, June 13, 1878.

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. No. 415) for the relief of Ella Long.

Attest: GEORGE C. GORHAM, Secretary.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the request of the Senate will be granted, as that has been the uniform practice heretofore.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

WILLIAM M. KENDALL.

On motion of Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, a bill (S. No. 605) for the relief of William M. Kendall was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

JESSE TURNER AND OTHERS.

Mr. CRAVENS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 1038, for the relief of Jesse Turner and others, sureties on the official bond of George W. Clarke, formerly Indian agent, for reference to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. REED. I insist on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That cuts off the proposition of the gentleman from Arkansas.

And then (at three o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BLACKBURN: The petition of John H. Donovan, captain United States Army, retired, that his name be placed upon the retired list of the Army as colonel—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BOYD: The petition of Andrew Hasmer, for compensation for cotton seized by United States officials and sold—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 11, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

VISITORS TO WEST POINT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. WINDOM and Mr. WHYTE to attend the next annual examination of cadets at the United States Military Academy at West Point, under the provisions of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, recommending an appropriation of $50,000 for the fitting up and making ready for occupancy the new State Department building; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FERRY presented the petition of J. L. Frisbee, United States consul at Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil, praying that that consulate be advanced from Schedule C to Schedule B, and the salary of the consul made not less than $1,500; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BOOTH presented the petition of John Miller and others, citizens of California, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the outlet of the Sacramento River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented the petition of James L. Reynolds and A. Wilhelm, sureties of Samuel M. Reynolds, late paymaster in the United States Army, praying to have refunded to them the amount of certain moneys paid by them as such sureties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1408) relating to the appointment of professors of mathematics in the Navy, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3055) to promote a knowledge of steam engineering and iron-ship building among the students of scientific schools or colleges in the United States, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5307) to correct an error of enrollment in bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, to report it without amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BLAINE. I am instructed also to ask, not however to interfere with morning business, the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it had better go over until we can see it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over under the rule.

Mr. WINDOM. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5231) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. WINDOM. I give notice that I shall ask the Senate to consider the bill to-morrow.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5230) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2161) for the relief of M. G. Harman, of Virginia, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of T. G. Senseney and other heirs of the estate of Jacob Senseney, deceased, praying compensation for the use and occupancy of certain property belonging to the estate of the decedent at Winchester, Virginia, by United States military forces during the late civil war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the petitioners were granted leave to withdraw their petition and papers.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 960) for the relief of James C. Fox, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 860) for the relief of James Fellows, have instructed me to report it adversely and recommend its indefinite postponement. No evidence has been filed with the committee in support of the bill. A communication from the Post-Office Department advises the committee that there is no evidence that there is anything due him.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there a written report?

Mr. HAMLIN. There is no written report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1475) for the relief of the sureties, &c., of Samuel M. Reynolds, late additional paymaster of United States Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BECK, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1476) to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the bill read at length.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be reported at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section No. 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, being in chapter 1, title 14 of said Revised Statutes, which provides that "no person who has served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army of the United States," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. BECK. I ask that the bill lie on the table informally, as I am not quite sure as to the committee to which I desire it to go.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie on the table, subject to the call of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. FERRY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1477) to designate, classify, and fix the salaries of persons in the railway-mail service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BOOTH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1478) for the relief of settlers on public lands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ROLLINS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1479) relating to assessments for special improvements in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAMLIN (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1480) to provide a commission for the adjudication of damages to the Norwegian bark Atlantic by collision with the United States steam sloop-of-war Vandalia, and for payment of any award made by said commission; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1481) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Willamette River, between the city of Portland and the city of East Portland, in Multnomah County, State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1482) appropriating $175,000 for the construction of a revenue-marine steamer for services in Alaskan waters; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1483) granting a pension to Henry Stanley Wetmore, late volunteer lieutenant United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WHYTE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1484) amendatory of the act to incorporate the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. PADDOCK, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Jearum Atkins be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

ISSUES OF ARMS.

Mr. MERRIMON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, instructed to furnish for the use of the Senate a statement showing the number and quality of arms of all kinds, the equipments and ammunition to be used in connection therewith, supplied from the ordnance department of the Army to officers and soldiers, marshals or their deputies, Indian agents, and internal revenue officers and revenue agents, respectively; and when and where to be used, under direction of the Department of the Interior, the Department of the Treasury, and the Department of Justice, since the 1st day of January, A. D. 1872, and where such arms now are; whether such arms or any or them have been sold, and for what price, and what disposition has been made of the proceeds of any such sale, and designating by what authority such arms and other things were so supplied from time to time.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

On motion of Mr. MERRIMON, it was Ordered, That the bill (H. R. No. 2843) to provide for taking testimony for the courts of the District of Columbia be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there further business for the morning hour? [A pause.] The Chair hears of none, and the Senate proceeds to the consideration of its unfinished business, being Senate bill No. 1308.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The consideration of the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes, was assigned for to-day by the Senate. Do I understand that the bill which is now called up takes precedence of that special order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It does, being the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I give notice, then, that I shall call up Senate bill No. 300 promptly when the consideration of the bill now before the Senate shall have been completed; and I ask that Senate bill No. 300 go over without prejudice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To this the Chair hears no objection. Are there amendments in Committee of the Whole to the bill before the Senate?

Mr. MATTHEWS. In reference to the notice which has just been given by the Senator from New Hampshire in regard to the bill to amend the statutes in relation to patents, I desire to say that I shall expect, and I now give notice, that at the conclusion of the debate upon the pending bill, unless there is an appropriation bill standing in the way, I shall call up Senate bill No. 942, in reference to the Texas Pacific Railway, and ask for its consideration by the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate at that time will determine which bill shall have the preference. Are there amendments as in Committee of the Whole to the bill before the Senate? The Chair hears none, and the bill is reported to the Senate. Are there amendments to the bill in the Senate?

Mr. BAYARD. Do I understand that the Senate is about to take up the bill regulating the counting of the electoral votes?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate has taken it up under the rule, it being the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. BAYARD. I am so very conscious of the importance and the gravity of the measure and so desirous to do my due share in reaching a proper solution of the question, that I should like a little time to decide whether I shall submit any remarks to the Senate upon that bill or not. I am disposed to favor its passage, but there are considerations to be submitted to the Senate as to portions of the bill and its effect, which I would prefer having time to consider. I do not know how long the matter which we understand is to be taken up to-day, the resolutions of the Senator from Maine, will occupy the Senate. If, however, it shall take but a short time to-day, I should be disposed to submit what I may have to say upon the electoral bill, at the close of that discussion, not to ask its delay; but I do not think the bill should be taken up and passed in the morning hour on any day. I therefore suggest that it be passed over informally for the purpose of discussion, which I shall aid the Senator from Vermont in bringing on at any time in my power.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Delaware perfectly well understands that nothing could give me more pleasure, nothing could give the rest of the Senate more pleasure, than to hear him upon this question; and my only consideration is one that he himself has adverted to, the necessity of action, and the necessity of action speedily if we are able to act, if it is to have any final result. This is a short session of Congress; it will terminate on the 3d of March. This bill is a Senate bill. If in any form it meets the approval of this body, the House of Representatives must have time to consider and suggest amendments, it may be, or to differ, or whatever. This bill was reported at the last session of Congress a considerable period before its adjournment. I endeavored on one occasion a week or two after it was reported to get the attention of the Senate to it then, but on account of the fact that it had been recently reported and the gravity of the subject the Senate postponed its consideration. Immediately upon the opening of this session I gave notice, nearly a week in advance, that on Monday last I would ask the Senate to consider it, and urged Senators so far as I had any right to urge them to take the intervening time for the private study of the bill, so that we might go on and act. It has now been under consideration for two days and this is the third. Of course the mere temporary convenience of a Senator, as it was understood that the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] desired to have it laid aside to submit some remarks upon a resolution of his, which is a courtesy usually granted, would lead me when one o'clock comes and the Senator from Maine desires to speak to assent to hearing him for the short time that I understand he desires to be heard; and I should not urge the bill to be disposed of at this moment if the Senator from Delaware wishes to speak after that; but my only point is to ask the Senate to treat this now, as it has been under consideration so long and reported so long, as a matter of definite business, in which we must make more progress than one speech a day or two speeches a day. We ought to go on and dispose of it either to-day or to-morrow, finally. To the present object of the Senator, not to have the bill instantly disposed of, I am quite willing to yield, but because presently we shall have to do something else.

Mr. BAYARD. I was in hopes that there would have been a more extended discussion of this measure. It is one I think on which we require light from every quarter. A measure of this kind cannot be scrutinized and criticised from too many stand-points, the more the better. We are fully aware that the proceedings in the Senate, the discussions here, will be perhaps of some use elsewhere in the consideration of this bill. I am obliged to the Senator for considering my personal feelings, but I scarcely put my motion upon that ground. There remains but a half hour of the morning hour, which would not be time sufficient to enter into a discussion of a measure of this importance, and what remarks I would have to make probably have to be adjourned until after the consideration of the business which has been arranged for the day. Still I trust that we shall take up the measure as soon as possible. I desire that the action of the Senate shall be had upon the bill, and I certainly do not mean in any way to be responsible for delay, for I think it is a very serious thing to answer for. I hope the bill will be passed over informally.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Delaware is quite right in saying that the bill ought to be studied and considered, but he must bear in mind that the general field that this bill covers has been within very recent periods more than once exhaustively explored by discussions in this Chamber, exhaustively explored by the search for and the bringing forward of every precedent and historic incident which can possibly throw light upon the general aspects of the question. It appeared to me, therefore, that extended debate, such as the occasion originally called for and produced, and such as again was produced less than two years ago upon a memorable occasion of this character, although that was a special one, would lead the Senate to be informed or to have within its reach every source of information and argument upon the general subject that could now be supplied. That led me in opening the debate on the merits of the bill to confine my remarks not so much to the general question which I thought had been exhausted as to the particular provisions and bearings of this special measure.

But, as I said, Mr. President, at this moment I should certainly not ask the Senate to pass the bill or to refuse to pass it when after a little while the Senator would like to go on.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair then understands that the bill may go over, remaining as the unfinished business of the Senate, subject only to the occupancy of the Senate by the Senator from Maine upon his resolutions relative to the exercise of the elective franchise?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir; and to come up then.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the mean time the special order assigned for to-day, having been called up, will be considered until one o'clock.

REVISION OF THE PATENT LAWS.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I call up Senate bill No. 300.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate. The Secretary will report the bill at length.

The Secretary read the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired. This bill will go over to the day attaching to and following the unfinished business of the Senate.

EXERCISE OF ELECTIVE FRANCHISE.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move that all previous orders be postponed and that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the resolutions introduced by my colleague, [Mr. BLAINE.]

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let the resolutions be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be reported at length.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire and report to the Senate whether at the recent elections the constitutional rights of American citizens were violated in any of the States of the Union; whether the right of suffrage of citizens of the United States, or of any class of such citizens, was denied or abridged by the action of the election officers of any State in refusing to receive their votes, in failing to count them, or in receiving and counting fraudulent ballots in pursuance of a conspiracy to make the lawful votes of such citizens of none effect; and whether such citizens were prevented from exercising the elective franchise, or forced to use it against their wishes, by violence or threats, or hostile demonstrations of armed men or other organizations, or by any other unlawful means or practices.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be further instructed to inquire and report whether it is within the competency of Congress to provide by additional legislation for the more perfect security of the right of suffrage to citizens of the United States in all the States of the Union.

Resolved, That in prosecuting these inquiries the Judiciary Committee shall have the right to send for persons and papers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate agree to these resolutions, and upon this question the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. THURMAN. Before the Senator from Maine proceeds, I ask leave to move an amendment. I can withhold it, however.

Mr. BLAINE. I will yield to the Senator in a very few minutes.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the pending resolutions were offered by me with a twofold purpose in view:

First, To place on record, in a definite and authentic form, the frauds and outrages by which some recent elections were carried by the Democratic party in the Southern States:

Second, To find if there be any method by which a repetition of these crimes against a free ballot may be prevented.

The newspaper is the channel through which the people of the United States are informed of current events, and the accounts given in the press represent the elections in some of the Southern States to have been accompanied by violence; in not a few cases reaching the destruction of life; to have been controlled by threats that awed and intimidated a large class of voters; to have been manipulated by fraud of the most shameless and shameful description. Indeed in South Carolina there seems to have been no election at all in any proper sense of the term. There was instead a series of skirmishes over the State in which the polling-places were regarded as forts to be captured by one party and held against the other, and where this could not be done with convenience, frauds in the count and tissue-ballot devices were resorted to in order to effectually destroy the voice of the majority. These in brief are the accounts given in the non-partisan press of the disgraceful outrages that attended the recent elections, and so far as I have seen, these statements are without serious contradiction. It is but just and fair to all parties, however, that an impartial investigation of the facts shall be made by a committee of the Senate, proceeding under the authority of law and representing the power of the nation. Hence my resolutions.

But we do not need investigation to establish certain facts already of official record. We know that one hundred and six Representatives in Congress were recently chosen in the States formerly slave-holding and that the democrats elected one hundred and one or possibly one hundred and two and the republicans four or possibly five. We know that thirty-five of these Representatives were assigned to the Southern States by reason of the colored population, and that the entire political power thus founded on the numbers of the colored people has been seized and appropriated to the aggrandizement of its own strength by the democratic party of the South.

The issue thus raised before the country, Mr. President, is not one of mere sentiment for the rights of the negro—though far distant be the day when the rights of any American citizen, however black or however poor, shall form the mere dust of the balance in any controversy; nor is the issue one that involves the waving of the "bloody shirt," to quote the elegant vernacular of democratic vituperation; nor still further is the issue as now presented only a question of the equality of the black voter of the South with the white voter of the South; the issue, Mr. President, has taken a far wider range, one of portentous magnitude; and that is, whether the white voter of the North shall be equal to the white voter of the South in shaping the policy and fixing the destiny of this country; or whether, to put it still more baldly, the white man who fought in the ranks of the Union Army shall have as weighty and influential a vote in the Government of the Republic as the white man who fought in the ranks of the rebel army. The one fought to uphold, the other to destroy, the Union of the States, and to-day he who fought to destroy is a far more important factor in the Government of the nation than he who fought to uphold it.

Let me illustrate my meaning by comparing groups of States of the same representative strength North and South. Take the States of South Carolina, Mississippi, and Louisiana. They send seventeen Representatives to Congress. Their aggregate population is con-posed of ten hundred and thirty-five thousand whites and twelve hundred and twenty-four thousand colored; the colored being nearly two hundred thousand in excess of the whites. Of the seventeen Representatives, then, it is evident that nine were apportioned to these States by reason of their colored population, and only eight by reason of their white population; and yet in the choice of the entire seventeen Representatives the colored voters had no more voice or power than their remote kindred on the shores of Senegambia or on the Gold Coast. The ten hundred and thirty-five thousand white people had the sole and absolute choice of the entire seventeen Representatives. In contrast, take two States in the North, Iowa and Wisconsin, with seventeen Representatives. They have a white population of two million two hundred and forty-seven thousand—considerably more than double the entire white population of the three Southern States I have named. In Iowa and Wisconsin, therefore, it takes one hundred and thirty-two thousand white population to send a Representative to Congress, but in South Carolina, Mississippi, and Louisiana every sixty thousand white people send a Representative. In other words, sixty thousand white people in those Southern States have precisely the same political power in the government of the country that one hundred and thirty-two thousand white people have in Iowa and Wisconsin.

Take another group of seventeen Representatives from the South and from the North. Georgia and Alabama have a white population of eleven hundred and fifty-eight thousand and a colored population of ten hundred and twenty thousand. They send seventeen Representatives to Congress, of whom nine were apportioned on account of the white population and eight on account of the colored population. But the colored voters are not able to choose a single Representative, the white Democrats choosing the whole seventeen. The four Northern States, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, and California, have seventeen Representatives, based on a white population of two and a quarter millions, or almost double the white population of Georgia and Alabama, so that in these relative groups of States we find the white man South exercises by his vote double the political power of the white man North.

Let us carry the comparison to a more comprehensive generalization. The eleven States that formed the Confederate Government had by the last census a population of nine and a half millions, of which in round numbers five and a half millions were white and four millions colored. On this aggregate population seventy-three Representatives in Congress were apportioned to those States—forty-two or three of whom were by reason of the white population, and thirty or thirty-one by reason of the colored population. At the recent election the white democracy of the South seized seventy of the seventy-three districts, and thus secured a democratic majority in the next House of Representatives. Thus it appears that throughout the States that formed the late Confederate Government sixty-five thousand whites—the very people that rebelled against the Union—are enabled to elect a Representative in Congress, while in the loyal States it requires one hundred and thirty-two thousand of the white people that fought for the Union to elect a Representative. In levying every tax, therefore, in making every appropriation of money, in fixing every line of public policy, in decreeing what shall be the fate and fortune of the Republic, the Confederate soldier South is enabled to cast a vote that is twice as powerful and twice as influential as the vote of the Union soldier North.

But the white men of the South did not acquire and do not hold this superior power by reason of law or justice, but in disregard and defiance of both. The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution was expected to be and was designed to be a preventive and corrective of all such possible abuses. The reading of the clause applicable to the case is instructive and suggestive. Hear it:

> Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

The patent, undeniable intent of this provision was that if any class of voters were denied or in any way abridged in their right of suffrage, then the class so denied or abridged should not be counted in the basis of representation; or, in other words, that no State or States should gain a large increase of representation in Congress by reason of counting any class of population not permitted to take part in electing such Representatives. But the construction given to this provision is that before any forfeiture of representation can be enforced the denial or abridgment of suffrage must be the result of a law specifically enacted by the State. Under this construction every negro voter may have his suffrage absolutely denied or fatally abridged by the violence, actual or threatened, of irresponsible mobs, or by frauds and deceptions of State officers from the governor down to the last election clerk, and then, unless some State law can be shown that authorizes the denial or abridgment, the State escapes all penalty or peril of reduced representation. This construction may be upheld by the courts, ruling on the letter of the law, "which killeth," but the spirit of justice cries aloud against the evasive and atrocious conclusion that deals out oppression to the innocent and shields the guilty from the legitimate consequences of willful transgression.

The colored citizen is thus most unhappily situated; his right of suffrage is but a hollow mockery; it holds to his ear the word of promise but breaks it always to his hope, and he ends only in being made the unwilling instrument of increasing the political strength of that party from which he received ever-tightening fetters when he was a slave and contemptuous refusal of civil rights since he was made free. He resembles indeed those unhappy captives in the East who deprived of their birthright are compelled to yield their strength to the upbuilding of the monarch from whose tyrannies they have most to fear, and to fight against the power from which alone deliverance might be expected. The franchise intended for the shield and defense of the negro has been turned against him and against his friends and has vastly increased the power of those from whom he has nothing to hope and everything to dread.

The political power thus appropriated by southern Democrats by reason of the negro population amounts to thirty-five Representatives in Congress. It is massed almost solidly and offsets the great State of New York; or Pennsylvania and New Jersey together; or the whole of New England; or Ohio and Indiana united; or the combined strength of Illinois, Minnesota, Kansas, California, Nevada, Nebraska, Colorado, and Oregon. The seizure of this power is wanton usurpation; it is flagrant outrage; it is violent perversion of the whole theory of republican government. It inures solely to the present advantage and yet, I believe, to the permanent dishonor of the Democratic party. It is by reason of this trampling down of human rights, this ruthless seizure of unlawful power that the Democratic party holds the popular branch of Congress to-day and will in less than ninety days have control of this body also, thus grasping the entire legislative department of the Government through the unlawful capture of the Southern States. If the proscribed vote of the South were cast as its lawful owners desire, the Democratic party could not gain power. Nay, if it were not counted on the other side against the instincts and the interests, against the principles and the prejudices of its lawful owners, Democratic success would be hopeless. It is not enough, then, for modern Democratic tactics that the negro vote shall be silenced; the demand goes farther and insists that it shall be counted on their side, that all the Representatives in Congress and all the Presidential electors apportioned by reason of the negro vote shall be so cast and so governed as to insure Democratic success—regardless of justice, in defiance of law.

And this injustice is wholly unprovoked. I doubt if it be in the power of the most searching investigation to show that in any Southern State during the period of Republican control any legal voter was ever debarred from the freest exercise of his suffrage. Even the revenges which would have leaped into life with many who despised the negro were buried out of sight with a magnanimity which the "superior race" fail to follow and seem reluctant to recognize. I know it is said in retort of such charges against the southern elections as I am now reviewing that unfairness of equal gravity prevails in northern elections. I hear it in many quarters and read it in the papers that in the late exciting election in Massachusetts intimidation and bulldozing, if not so rough and rancorous as in the South, were yet as widespread and effective.

I have read and yet I refuse to believe that the distinguished gentleman, who made an energetic but unsuccessful canvass for the governorship of that State, has indorsed and approved these charges, and I have accordingly made my resolutions broad enough to include their thorough investigation. I am not demanding fair elections in the South without demanding fair elections in the North also. But venturing to speak for the New England States, of whose laws and customs I know something, I dare assert that in the late election in Massachusetts, or any of her neighboring Commonwealths, it will be impossible to find even one case where a voter was driven from the polls, where a voter did not have the fullest, fairest, freest opportunity to cast the ballot of his choice and have it honestly and faithfully counted in the returns. Suffrage on this continent was first made universal in New England, and in the administration of their affairs her people have found no other appeal necessary than that which is addressed to their honesty of conviction and to their intelligent self-interest. If there be anything different to disclose I pray you show it to us that we may amend our ways.

But whenever a feeble protest is made against such injustice as I have described in the South the response we get comes to us in the form of a taunt, "What are you going to do about it?" and "How do you propose to help yourselves?" This is the stereotyped answer of defiance which intrenched wrong always gives to inquiring justice; and those who imagine it to be conclusive do not know the temper of the American people. For let me assure you that against the complicated outrage upon the right of representation lately triumphant in the South, there will be arrayed many phases of public opinion in the North not often hitherto in harmony. Men who have cared little, and affected to care less, for the rights or the wrongs of the negro suddenly find that vast monetary and commercial interests, great questions of revenue, adjustments of tariff, vast investments in manufactures, in railways, and in mines, are under the control of a Democratic Congress whose majority was obtained by depriving the negro of his rights under a common constitution and common laws. Men who have expressed disgust with the waving of bloody shirts and have been offended with talk about negro equality are beginning to perceive that the pending question of to-day relates more pressingly to the equality of white men under this Government, and that however careless they may be about the rights or the wrongs of the negro they are very jealous and tenacious about the rights of their own race and the dignity of their own firesides and their own kindred.

I know something of public opinion in the North. I know a great deal about the views, wishes, and purposes of the Republican party of the nation. Within that entire great organization there is not one man, whose opinion is entitled to be quoted, that does not desire peace and harmony and friendship and a patriotic and fraternal union between the North and the South. This wish is spontaneous, instinctive, universal throughout the Northern States; and yet, among men of character and sense, there is surely no need of attempting to deceive ourselves as to the precise truth. First pure, then peaceable. Gush will not remove a grievance, and no disguise of State rights will close the eyes of our people to the necessity of correcting a great national wrong. Nor should the South make the fatal mistake of concluding that injustice to the negro is not also injustice to the white man; nor should it ever be forgotten that for the wrongs of both a remedy will assuredly be found. The war, with all its costly sacrifices, was fought in vain unless equal rights for all classes be established in all the States of the Union; and now, in words which are those of friendship, however differently they may be accepted, I tell the men of the South here on this floor and beyond this Chamber, that even if they could strip the negro of his constitutional rights, they can never permanently maintain the inequality of white men in this nation; they can never make a white man's vote in the South doubly as powerful in the administration of the Government as a white man's vote in the North.

In a memorable debate in the House of Commons, Mr. Macaulay reminded Daniel O'Connell, when he was moving for Repeal, that the English whigs had endured calumny, abuse, popular fury, loss of position, exclusion from Parliament rather than the great agitator himself should be less than a British subject; and Mr. Macaulay warned him that they would never suffer him to be more. Let me now remind you that the Government under whose protecting flag we sit to-day sacrificed myriads of lives and expended thousands of millions of treasure that our countrymen of the South should remain citizens of the United States, having equal personal rights and equal political privileges with all other citizens. And I venture, now and here, to warn the men of the South, in the exact words of Macaulay, that we will never suffer them to be more! [Applause in the galleries, which the Vice-President checked by rapping with his gavel.]

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the resolution the following:

> The committee shall also inquire whether any citizen of any State has been dismissed or threatened with dismissal from employment or the deprivation of any right or privilege by reason of his vote or intention to vote at the recent election, or has been otherwise interfered with; and to inquire whether in the year 1878 money was raised by assessment or otherwise upon Federal office-holders or employés for election purposes, and under what circumstances and by what means; and, if so, what amount was so raised and how the same was expended; and, further, whether such assessments were or not in violation of law; and shall further inquire into the action and conduct of United States supervisors of elections in the several States, and as to the number of marshals, deputy marshals, and others employed to take part in the conduct of the said elections, in what State or city appointed, the amount of money paid or promised to be paid to them, and how or by whom, and under what law or authority.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I attempted to offer that amendment before the Senator from Maine proceeded with his remarks, but failed to have an opportunity to do so. I intended then to say that whatever opinion might be entertained on this side of the Chamber as to the propriety of the original resolutions, as to the competency of Congress to make all the investigations that those resolutions contemplate, yet we were disposed to waive all scruples of that character and suffer the resolutions to pass without opposition if the amendment now proposed should be added to them.

The Senator from Maine, however, having a speech carefully studied and prepared, exercised his right to deliver that speech before my amendment could be offered. I do not complain of that at all, nor do I now rise to make any extended reply to the speech that I have heard just now. Should this debate be protracted, I may exercise my privilege of saying something in reply to the Senator from Maine, but to-day I shall confine myself to a very few general observations.

The Senator is frank in one thing. His resolutions are broad. They include all the States; they provide for an investigation whether the rights of American citizens in connection with the elective franchise have been violated or interfered with in any of the States; but he frankly admits in the very outset of his remarks that that was not his purpose; that his purpose was to assail the democracy of the South. He had two purposes in preparing this carefully elaborated speech; not to vindicate the right of suffrage throughout this whole Union, but to inquire whether the democracy of the Southern States had violated the rights of American citizens, and then to find out what could be done with them. Now, Mr. President, that is a very frank, and I have no doubt a very true, statement of the animus of these resolutions.

Mr. President, I said that there might be some doubts as to the propriety of this investigation. I repeat it. There may be such doubts, especially to-day. Here is a short session of Congress. We have, excluding the recess that we always take, less perhaps than two months within which to dispose of the appropriation bills and the other measures of legislation that necessarily require the attention of Congress if the business of the session is to be disposed of and no extra session is to be called. And now, sir, the Senator proposes an investigation that I defy any committee that can be formed to make with anything like thoroughness, nay, in any satisfactory manner, with anything like justice either to those who are implicated or to those who may be implicated, within the time that remains of this session of the Senate. It is a simple impossibility. I have therefore wondered why these resolutions were introduced, unless they were to be made a string upon which to hang speeches to arouse sectional hatred in one portion of this Union against an almost defenseless people in another portion of the Union. [Applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair gives notice that if this applause shall be repeated the galleries will be cleared.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I hope the Chair will add, "And that the persons guilty of this disorder be taken into arrest."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair adds that.

Mr. THURMAN. And I hope that there will be no interruption whatsoever. I did not say anything when the galleries cheered the peroration of my friend from Maine, for I love an eloquent thing as much as anybody can, and have sometimes cheered it when I did not agree with it at all. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, this assault of the Senator from Maine is not an assault simply, however, upon the people of the South. I said five months ago in a speech—what I beg pardon for repeating here—that it did seem to me as clear as anything in American politics could be, that there was a deliberately formed purpose, under pretext that there was a solid South, to create a solid North to rule not only the solid South, but to rule one-half nearly, if not more, of the people of the North. I thought so then; I think so yet. I thought then and I think now, that a purpose more unpatriotic, more unjust, more fraught with ruin to this country never entered the brain of man. That is my belief.

Why, Mr. President, of what is it that the Senator from Maine complains? That there were not enough republican votes at the South. That is the amount of it; and how does he make that out? He assumes, without one shadow of proof produced here, that the negroes of the South were prevented from voting, or forced to vote the democratic ticket. He assumes, therefore, that owing to those causes the negroes of the South are not represented by the members of the House of Representatives who come from that section of the Union, or by the Senators on this floor who represent southern States. What right has the Senator from Maine to say that the negroes of the South are not represented by the chosen Representatives of the South and the chosen Senators of the South? What right has he to vote those negroes himself on one side, and say that the men who have the credentials of election here do not represent their constituents? Why, Mr. President, it is a bare assumption on his part that he has no right whatever to make.

But, again, the Senator ought to have thought of this when he was framing his fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, or when he was assisting in framing them. There were men then, men of his own party too, who told him with long foresight that in the end property and intelligence and education will rule the land and ignorance cannot. Mr. President, there were men of his own party who foresaw that those people who have the intelligence, the education, and the property will not be ruled by those who have neither; and in that it is not necessary to separate the community into white people and into colored people. Not at all is it necessary to do that. No, Mr. President, the result of these constitutional amendments was easy enough to be foreseen. I am not here to-day to justify the violation of the rights of any man, however humble he may be, whatever may be the color of his skin, whatever may be the poverty of his situation. I am here for no such purpose as that. If I know my own heart, I am as much in favor of respecting the rights of every man under the Constitution as the Senator from Maine or any other Senator on this floor; but I do know that property, intelligence, education, will assert their influence everywhere on the face of this globe.

Now, Mr. President, let me say one word more on this subject. Who was it that drew the color line between the whites and the negroes in the South? Let me tell you, sir, that millions of money, of the money of the people of the United States, were expended by your agents, the Freedman's Bureau agents, in getting every colored man in the South into loyal leagues and swearing him never to vote for a democrat. That is where the color line began to be drawn. That institution which took charge of the negro at the ballot-box, took charge of him in the cotton-field, took charge of him everywhere, supervised every contract that he made, allowed no contract to be made unless it had the approval of the agents of the Freedman's Bureau, and spent the money and property called "captured and abandoned property" that was surrendered to it, and many millions of money directly appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States—it was that Bureau and its agents who first drew the color line. And yet when the white people of the South, when the men owning the property and having the intelligence and the education at the South, saw their very social system menaced with destruction, saw their very households threatened with ruin under an inundation of barbarism directed by the most unscrupulous of men, and when they naturally came together, when they naturally united as people menaced with danger ever will unite, then a cry is raised against "the solid South!" Ah, Mr. President, it will not do. This system of legislation toward the South that began more than ten years ago is reaping its fruit; and it is not by additional penal laws that you can better the condition of this country. What does the Senator want more penal laws for? Let him look into the statute-book on this very subject; let him read the statutes in regard to the enforcement of the rights of citizens to vote, and I defy him to find in the statute-books of any civilized country on this globe a body of laws so minute, so searching, and bristling all over with fines and forfeitures as do these laws.

But that is not all. In addition to that you have a vast machinery of superintendents of election, Federal supervisors, marshals, deputy marshals, paid electioneerers out of the Treasury of the United States, under the guise of being men to preserve the freedom of suffrage and peace at elections. You have a whole army of them provided for by your statutes. What more does the Senator want? I think I see, Mr. President, what is wanted. I think this is a note which is sounded to the people of the North that they must retrace their steps; and this very party which required two amendments to the Constitution to be made in the interest, it was said, of the colored population of the South, is now preparing to face about, retrace its steps, and undo what it did only a few years ago. Either directly or by indirection that is to be done. Indeed, I thought, while the Senator from Maine was making his speech, how much reason this country, and especially the southern part of the country, had to congratulate itself that the next House of Representatives will not have a majority of gentlemen thinking like the Senator from Maine, for if he is right in what he said, if his threats are not mere idle wind—and I certainly do not attribute any such thing to him—if they are deep-seated and permanent thoughts of those with whom he acts, then I should be prepared to see a House of Representatives in which there was a republican majority exclude southern members by the score; then I should be prepared to see them decide themselves that the right of suffrage was prohibited down there to the negro, and then to see them in their supreme authority, as they would construe it, vote out the chosen Representatives of the South, not by ones, not by twos, but by the score. It is a fortunate thing for this country, it is a fortunate thing for our free institutions, that there is not in the present House of Representatives, and will not be in the next, a majority thinking as the Senator from Maine thinks, and will ing to act as I fear he is willing to act.

Mr. President, one word on the amendment I have offered. My own belief is that there is a far greater danger that menaces our institutions and menaces the right of suffrage in this country than that to which the Senator from Maine has alluded. Sir, the most disheartening thing to an American who loves free institutions is to see that year by year the corrupt use of money in elections is making its way until the time may come, and that within the observation of even the oldest man here, when elections in the United States will be as debauched as ever they were in the worst days of the old borough parliamentary elections in the mother land.

Mr. President, there is the great danger. The question is whether this country shall be governed with a view to the rights of every man, the poor man as well as the rich man, or whether the longest purse shall carry the elections and this be a mere plutocracy instead of a democratic republic. That is the danger; and that danger, let me tell my friend, exists far more in the North than it does in the South. Sir, if he wants to preserve the purity of elections, if he wants to have this Government perpetuated as a system that can be honestly administered from the primary election to the signature of a bill by the President of the United States, let him set his face and exercise his great ability in stopping the flood-gates of corruption that threaten to deluge the whole land and bring republican institutions into utter ruin and disgrace.

Mr. President, there is one thing that made me doubt a little as to the propriety of these resolutions, although, as I said, I am going to vote for them; and what the Senator from Maine has said has added to the great doubt which I entertained on that subject, and that is, that I am not quite sure that there are not persons who favor this kind of resolution and as much debate upon it as you can have and as much investigation as you can have in order to divert public attention from the real questions which ought to engage the Congress of the United States. Questions of economy, questions of finance, questions of currency, all are shoved aside that popular speeches may be made tending to excite one section of the people against another and to set their minds mad with passion, instead of appealing to their cool and deliberate reason. I certainly do not charge the Senator from Maine with having got this up for the purpose of putting aside and throwing out of view that which should form the subject of our thoughts and of our legislation, but I fear that such may be in some men's minds one of the things to be effected by such resolutions.

Mr. President, I have said much more than I intended to say; indeed I did not expect to speak ten minutes, but I have spoken twenty and I do not know but twenty-five. I beg pardon for having spoken so long and will take my seat.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am a good deal impressed with what the Senator from Ohio has said particularly in respect of the corrupt use of money and the attempt to use it to influence elections. Disclosures that are said to have been opened and have been stated in the newspapers during the last campaign undoubtedly lead to an inquiry into that very dangerous practice, and I hope that his amendment will be so enlarged as to cover all subjects of that character. But what I rise to do now is to ask that his amendment may be printed and then to call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order to print will be entered.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not desire to detain the Senate, but I wish to say one word. The honorable Senator from Ohio has informed the country, and informed it with as much authority as any man in his party can speak, that property in the South will rule.

Mr. THURMAN. I said no such thing. I said no more of the South than I have said everywhere, that property, intelligence, and education will rule.

Mr. BLAINE. Regardless of numbers?

Mr. THURMAN. Oh, well, now, the Senator can have it "regardless of numbers," if he wants.

Mr. BLAINE. I understood the Senator; I was going to state him correctly——

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator cannot misrepresent me in regard to that. How will they rule "regardless of numbers?" By unlawful means? No, sir. Does not the Senator influence a good many people in Maine to vote as he thinks?

Mr. BLAINE. I should like to influence some in Ohio. [Laughter.]

Mr. THURMAN. He failed this year, but he does it every year, year in and year out, because he has intelligence and education and skill and property. That is the reason of it. And, sir, let me tell him that if he lived down South he would persuade—he would have a tail of negroes, more men probably than any Highland chief ever had in the Highlands, [laughter,] all by reason of his character, education, and property.

Mr. BLAINE. I am equally sure that if the Senator from Ohio lived in the South he would not have a tail of negroes following him at all. [Laughter.] We should be just in contrast. But I wanted to point this remark—the Senator qualifies it but still it stands out—and I illustrate by South Carolina with one hundred and fifty thousand more colored men than white men. And the leader of the democratic party, based as that party claims to be on the rights of the people without regard to caste or condition, without educational test or property qualification, as the democratic doctrine has always been, announces here to-day that property and education will rule. And when we assert that the South is ruled by violence he tells us that there are important questions which we should consider and that Congress has no time to waste upon that! The initial step in the organization of every legislative body, let me tell the Senator, is to see that it is honestly filled by men honestly elected; and if I were permitted by parliamentary law to speak of the other branch of Congress I would declare here to-day that the democratic party does not hold rightful sway in that House and will hold sway in the next House by fraud and outrage, which no mere declaration against sectional agitation can overcome or put out of sight. And now we are asked to abandon all sectional agitation, or asked, under the plea of abandoning sectional agitation, to submit all the grave and great questions that affect property and human rights to a Congress that is based upon the destruction of human rights—a Congress that lacks the warrant laid down by Jefferson of the right to govern. It has not "the consent of the governed." [Manifestations of applause in the galleries, which were checked by the Vice-President.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions go to the Calendar. The Senate resumes the consideration of its unfinished business.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. President, when these resolutions are printed and ready for action, I may have something to say upon the question of their adoption. Before the question passes off now, I wish to make one or two remarks, not upon the resolutions, but upon one or two points submitted by the Senator from Maine.

Sir, it is not a surprising thing, nor is it an unnatural one, that that distinguished Senator should feel and manifest a deep interest in the affairs of the Southern States. The people of that section have but recently undergone a vast change, social and political; and it is reasonable, it is eminently fit and proper, that one who bore so conspicuous a part in the adoption of the measures which brought about that vast transformation, who occupies so conspicuous a position at the present time, and who perhaps will occupy a still more distinguished position in the future, should scrutinize with anxious solicitude the progress of that people to reconstruction and to their readjustment to the healthy and normal conditions of our national life. Sir, had the Senator come forward with some well-devised scheme of public education by which this newly enfranchised race, who have had such exalted duties imposed upon them without culture and without even the trained intelligence of practical experience, may be fitted to exercise their great duties as freemen and citizens and the participants in the sovereignty of Commonwealths, every one would have recognized the propriety and the patriotism of such a movement; for he would have proposed to give to that people what they most need, and what would protect them from every evil and wrong which he now alleges that they labor under.

There are other evils in that country which might call forth the lofty and enlarged measures of a patriot and of an American statesman; but I must confess to some regret that a Senator so distinguished, in looking upon this recently dislocated member of this great American empire, instead of regarding it with reference to those great interests that affect the whole country through the long track of coming years, should have concentrated his whole attention upon its relation to parties and party contests; that nothing should have struck the Senator's notice or engaged his thoughts except the connection of that people with the ascendency and defeat of parties and their influence in Federal elections. Party organizations are no part of the Constitution, and they are agencies which work outside of the laws. But, sir, the gentleman's remarks were directed exclusively to the mere party and partisan aspects of this great subject; and with no intent whatever to utter a bitter retort I cannot but feel the regret that one of such resolute energies, of such tenacious purposes, such daring ambition, and such great abilities, should have so narrowed his mind as "to give to party what was meant for mankind."

But, sir, what is the point at last of the gentleman's argument this morning? It was remarkable for its significant omissions. It was directed exclusively to the suppression of the votes of a particular class of suffragans in the South. Mr. President, if I understood the debates at the time of the adoption of the amendment to which he refers, clothing the negroes of the South with the right of suffrage, it was to give them protection for their freedom and for the civil rights which the fourteenth amendment accorded to them. Through the protracted remarks of the Senator he could not utter one word—he could not, because it would not have been the truth if he had—to show that there was a single right of freedom or of citizenship belonging to the black race of the South that was not as secure and as well enjoyed as that of the proudest and freest white man in the land.

It is also a remarkable fact that in his indictment of the South there is no pretense that there is a single menace in her present attitude to any of the great interests of this country—not an imputation of that character—for "solid" (according to the usual phrase) as the South may be, she stands in line with a majority of the American people upon nearly every question which is now discussed in this nation or argued here in her council chambers.

But, sir, to come to the direct point, the Senator asserts that in consequence of the suppression of the negro vote at the South by means which, he alleges, are illegitimate and irregular, the South has a disproportionate party power in this Government. Sir, before this discussion is over I will show that the negro vote has not been suppressed in the South; I will demonstrate that this political phenomenon which is the subject of so much discussion and misrepresentation is a phenomenon that would occur in any free society, and that it has been brought about by the influences which intelligence and virtue and sagacity and the other elements of civilization always bring to bear upon the classes that are ignorant and debased.

But, sir, assuming all that the gentleman says to be true that there are in the House of Representatives one hundred and six Representatives elected of one party complexion and elected by means that are not what he considers legitimate, let us see where we stand in this position. Now, sir, what interest of the North, what interest of this country is endangered by it? Sir, with a united vote of the South she stands a powerless section in this Government, she is an impotent minority section in any event, unable to protect a single southern right or to defend a single southern interest.

But, says the gentleman, under the operations of these amendments the South have a representation not in proportion to the constituency which elect them, and the States of South Carolina and Mississippi and Alabama have much more power than twice the numbers in some of the Northwestern States which he mentioned. Mr. President, every member of that population in those States entitled to vote ought to be counted. You have no right to draw the line between the black and the white, and assume that the black man because he did not vote the republican ticket is therefore a suppressed voter. Is it to be assumed that in every southern State the property and population of the State are in such necessary antagonism that no amount of local misrule can teach them the advantage of their natural alliance? What right has he to assume that whites and blacks are never to vote and act together as citizens of a common country? Now, sir, let me call attention to one point in the Senator's argument. If we are to enter upon a system of legislation and political movements in order to adjust representation and political power in this Government according to the number of actually voting constituencies, the principle may operate further than the gentleman thinks.

What is the population of the State of Maine? I believe 625,000. It has been diminishing within the last twenty years. I cannot now recollect, but perhaps it is 623,000. Vermont, which is also solid, has not more than 350,000. And yet the State of Maine has as much power in this Government with her 600,000 people as the State of New York with her 5,000,000.

A SENATOR. You mean in this Chamber.

Mr. LAMAR. No, sir; I mean in this Government. Gentlemen correct me by saying "in this Chamber;" but I adhere to the phrase. I say, and repeat, that they have the affirmative power of legislation this day; 625,000 in Maine are equal to 5,000,000 in the State of New York. A positive equality of States, whatever be their population, in either Chamber where concurrent legislation is needed, is positive affirmative power in the passage of any law. Why, sir, the whole of New England has not three and a half millions of population; and yet under the operation of the Constitution and laws of the land, of which I make no complaint and which is a legitimate thing, those three and a half millions of population have six times as much power as sovereign commonwealths that have five millions. They have got as much power as twenty millions in the large Northwestern States that the gentleman called attention to.

Sir, why is one man in these Eastern States equal to twenty in the Northwest, except by virtue of the Constitution—the Constitution which we are intending to abide by and to maintain?

But as the gentleman has vouchsafed advice to southern men on this floor and outside, in all spirit of fairness and equity I will speak to the people of the New England States and tell them that in my opinion the direst foe they have got on earth is the Representative or Senator, whether from their own section or any other, that will kindle this fire whose subterranean flames will liquefy the very foundations on which these proud and free commonwealths now rear their aspiring heads. Sir, the Senator is fishing in troubled waters upon this subject; and when you come to agitate questions of this kind you will find that changes of a more radical and fundamental nature will be necessary in order to adjust representation to numbers in this Government.

I will not now proceed, sir, any further in my remarks. At another time when these resolutions come up, if they are to be discussed, I may participate in the discussion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the point of the Senator from Mississippi appears to be, that if a Senator from New England proposes to inquire whether the Constitution has been violated in depriving any part of the people of the States of their right to vote for members of Congress, &c., he thereby incurs the danger of oversetting the Constitution itself which says that the States in this body shall be equal, and therefore I understand him to put it out as a warning that the people of New England through their Senators and Representatives have no right to stand up for the Constitution as it is in favor of an equal representation by the people of the States in the other House, unless they run the risk of being exposed to the danger of having their senatorial representation overturned. That, then, is the question we are invited to consider and the peril that we expose ourselves to if we undertake to inquire whether the Constitution of the United States has been violated. In other words, the representatives of the democratic party of the South say to an inquiry into a violation of the Constitution, "If you dare to make such an inquiry, you run the risk of overturning the representation of the States and reducing ourselves to a state of servitude." That is the proposition!

Mr. LAMAR. I hope the Senator will allow me to explain——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. LAMAR. Or rather to protest against the interpretation which he has put upon my remarks. I made no such suggestion. It was simply in reply to the theory the Senator from Maine had broached, that this investigation was justified in order that the evil which he had disclosed of one hundred thousand white men in the South having a political power and vote in this Government equal to three hundred thousand somewhere else, that I said that the tendency of such a theory would lead to further investigation, and would undermine the principle and the system of government upon which our American fabric rests.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very glad to know, Mr. President, that the Senator did not mean what his remarks appeared to indicate; and he has misunderstood——

Mr. LAMAR. I did not mean what the gentleman has attempted to force my remarks into, but which he will never succeed in doing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is mistaken in that. I have not attempted to force the Senator's remarks into anything. The RECORD will show exactly what he has said, and I think it will appear that I have not misstated the substance of what he has said; but the Senator has greatly mistaken, with his present explanation, the point of the Senator from Maine. The Senator from Maine did not complain of the inequality of personages in one part of the Union or another. What he complained of was, supposing what he believes to be true turns out to be so when you have an investigation, that a small number of persons in the South by a gross and outrageous violation of the Constitution have taken to themselves by that species of usurpation the power of a large number under the Constitution exercised in a rightful way in the Northwest. Is the Senator dissatisfied if that turns out to be true, or would he like to rectify it? The Senator, of course, would like to rectify it. I must assume that he would. What, then, is the use of saying that you are going to overturn the Government if we undertake to find out whether the Constitution has been grossly and flagrantly violated by a denial of equal rights in respect of the elections to the popular branch of the Congress of the United States? And where is the necessity in such a case of holding out the terror and kindling the conflagration that the Senator referred to in respect of senatorial representation upon an inquiry of that kind? The people of New England, as far as I may speak for them, believe in justice and in equal rights under the Constitution and according to it, just as the fathers and their successors have made it; and that is in the States (and I am surprised to hear a southern Senator assail the very foundation of State rights) there is and there must be political equality; that in respect of the people represented in the other branch of Congress there shall be the fair equality of fair numbers fairly and freely exercising their rights and not the subjects of tyranny and corruption and fraud anywhere. That makes your Government; nothing more, nothing less.

I fail to see, then, Mr. President, the great danger that New England runs in undertaking to make an inquiry of this kind if the Senate agree to it. But I did not rise to enter into this discussion at all, but only now, that we have had a fair expression on both sides, to ask for the regular order.

Mr. LAMAR. Still, Mr. President, I cannot accept the position to which the Senator from Vermont assigns me. He says that he is surprised to find a southern Senator assailing the principle of State rights. He will never find me in that position, sir. I have ever been the defender of that doctrine. But surprises are constantly sprung upon us and the country will be not a little astonished to find the doctrine of State rights advocated by the distinguished Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think not. I have always done it.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that at the very earliest opportunity that the business of the Senate will permit I shall ask a vote upon these resolutions; and I desire merely to say in reply to the Senator from Mississippi that in the little colloquy between him and the Senator from Vermont I understand this to be about the residuum, that if I move an inquiry into the unconstitutional representation of Mississippi in the other House, he will move one into the constitutional representation of Maine in this branch! [Laughter.]

Mr. LAMAR. That will do pretty well for wit and pretty well for the Senator's peculiar species of perversion; but it will not do for the truth, for, sir, I protested that I not only would move no such inquiry but that I would oppose and fight against any such purpose. No, sir, the doctrine that I stated was that if the right of suffrage be invaded anywhere or any constitutional right infringed upon in any quarter or by anybody, it shall be maintained and enforced if necessary by all the constitutional power of the Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then we are all at one.

Mr. LAMAR. Exactly so, but not upon the ground that States shall be deprived of any of their representatives, because under the operation of the Constitution, either in its original provisions or in its amendments, their political power may be not in exact proportion to their numerical power in this Government. And I repeat the warning against this agitation about sectional power based on numbers, I warn Senators that in throwing their net into this troubled sea they may drag to the shore a vase like that of the fisherman in the Arabian Nights from which, when the seal was once broken, a demon emerged more potent than his deliverer and threatening his destruction.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know but he is here now. Now let us have the regular order.

Mr. LAMAR. I suppose that very witty remark was intended for private ears, and as I did not hear it I leave it without retort.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will now proceed to the consideration of its unfinished business.

COMMITTEE ON OMISSION IN ENROLLMENT.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Before that is taken up I wish to submit a resolution. It turns out that there is no fund out of which the expenses of the select committee raised under the resolution introduced by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CONOVER] the other day can be paid. The committee has proceeded in accordance with the resolution under which it was appointed to make the investigation ordered by the Senate, and for the purpose of remedying that deficiency I, by direction of the committee, offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate the fees of witnesses subpœnaed and attending before the special committee appointed under resolution of the Senate of December 3, introduced by Senator CONOVER, in relation to the omission of a part of the sundry civil bill, and all other necessary expenses attending the investigation now being made by said committee, upon being properly certified to by the chairman of said special committee.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1308) to amend sundry provisions of chapter 1, title 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to presidential electors, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon.

Mr. RANSOM. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator kindly withdraw that motion for a moment?

Mr. RANSOM. Certainly, I will, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can see, after the events that have occurred here, there is so much confusion that it is very difficult to do business. If the Senate is to adjourn now, I want to give notice that I shall ask the Senate to finish the pending measure to-morrow, to sit it out and get it disposed of, so that other matters may be taken up and considered in their order. I should prefer to have the Senate go on, but it does not seem to be very easy to get anybody to pay any attention to business now.

Mr. KERNAN. As some Senators desire to speak upon the bill, not myself but others, and as they are not ready to proceed to-day, and as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] desires to address the Senate upon the bill to amend the statutes in relation to patents, which was made the special order for to-day, I suggest that the pending bill be laid aside informally and that he be allowed to go on now, instead of the Senate adjourning at this time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to the bill going over until to-morrow as unfinished business, with the understanding that we go on with it then, and go on to an end. This matter has been so long before the Senate, now for months, that I do not feel justified in this short session in having it postponed beyond to-morrow. Senators ought to have their speeches ready if they wish to deliver them.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire that we do not adjourn now but let the bill go over informally and allow the Senator from New Hampshire to present to the Senate his views upon the bill which was made the special order for to-day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is just as hard for the Senator from New Hampshire to speak in this state of utter confusion as it is for other people.

Mr. KERNAN. I understand that he desires to do so.

Mr. RANSOM. It was in deference to the wish of certain Senators who desire to speak on the bill reported from the select committee by the Senator from Vermont, of whom I am not among the number, that I made the motion to adjourn the Senate; but if the Senator from New Hampshire desires to bring forward the bill indicated by the Senator from New York I withdraw my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont assent?

Mr. RANSOM. I understood the Senator from Vermont to assent to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With the understanding that the electoral bill shall stand as the unfinished business to-morrow, be taken up at one o'clock or earlier if the ordinary morning business shall have been disposed of, and then to be proceeded with until it is ended, I will assent; not otherwise.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is it understood that to-morrow immediately at the close of the morning hour, or sooner if its business shall have been concluded, the pending bill shall be considered as unfinished business? To this the Chair hears no objection; and he recognizes the Senator from New Hampshire.

REVISION OF THE PATENT LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the condition of the bill. The bill was read at length this morning, but in the confusion action was not had upon the amendments of the Committee on Patents, so that action will now be necessary, or at some stage of the bill, upon the amendments of the committee.

Mr. WADLEIGH. As it will be necessary to go through with the amendments of the committee, I prefer that that shall be done now, and therefore will not address the Senate at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments will be acted upon at this time.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I will say what I have to say at some other time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments will be reported in their order by the Secretary, and action taken in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. THURMAN. My attention has been called to this bill by a great many letters. I do not profess to understand it. Therefore I hope the chairman of the committee, when the amendments are called, at least those which are important and not merely of a slight character, will explain them. I will say in a word that there is one provision upon which I have received a great many letters on both sides, and upon which I for one wish some information in order to know how to vote. There is a controversy as I understand between the railroad companies on the one side and inventors on the other. No doubt the Senator from New Hampshire knows all about what that matter is. There is some provision in this bill in respect to it which has excited a great deal of interest both among inventors and among the railroad companies. I suppose every Senator has received a number of letters upon that subject. I should like, when the amendment which bears on that particular question in which they are so much interested comes up, that the Senator will explain it and let us know what the committee did.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendments in their order.

The first amendment of the Committee on Patents was, in section 1, line 4, after the word "equity," to insert the words "hereafter commenced;" so as to read:

That from and after the passage of this act no profits or damages in any suit at law or in equity hereafter commenced for the infringement of a patent shall be recovered which shall have accrued more than four years next preceding the commencement of such suit.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 14, after the word "that," to insert "the limitation herein provided for shall not apply to;" in line 15, after the word "act," to strike out "may be enforced by" and insert "on which;" after the word "suits," in line 16, to insert "shall be;" and before the word "years," in line 17, to strike out "four" and insert "two;" so as to read:

Provided also, That the limitation herein provided for shall not apply to rights of action existing at the passage of this act on which suits shall be brought within two years thereafter, if not previously barred by laws already existing; but nothing in this section contained shall revive any right of action already barred, nor prolong the right to sue on any cause of action already existing.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The bill is in Committee of the Whole, is it not?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So that these amendments can be again considered afterward.

The next amendment of the Committee on Patents was, in section 2, line 9, after the word "savings" to insert "from use;" in the same line, after the word "allowed," to insert "except in case of a use by therewith partially or completely making a product for sale;" so as to read:

In all cases where the patentee has elected to license other persons generally to use his invention, in like manner to that in which it was used by the defendant, or where it appears to the court or jury that, from the nature of the invention, it is for the interest of the patentee that other persons generally should use the same in like manner and pay him a license fee therefor, the measure of the plaintiff's damages shall be the same, both at law and in equity, and no account of profits or savings from use shall be allowed, except in case of a use by therewith partially or completely making a product for sale.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 15, after the word "the," to strike out "same" and insert "damages;" so as to read:

If a license fee has already been established by a reasonable number of transactions of a character applicable to the case at bar, that shall be adopted as the measure of said damages; but if not, then the court or jury shall determine the damages from all the evidence in the case.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 18, after the word "made," to strike out "unless it has" and insert "if he shall show that it has not;" so as to read:

In taking an account of profits in any case the defendant shall not be charged with any saving he may have made if he shall show that it has not enabled him to realize an actual profit in that part of his business connected with the use of the invention.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, after the word "reasonable," in line 30, to insert:

And whenever the court shall be of the opinion that the suit of the plaintiff, or the defense of the defendant, was vexatious, or the infringement was willful, the court may award against the defeated party such sum, by way of counsel fees and expenses, as it shall deem just and reasonable.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 42, after the word "injunction," to insert "nor to recover in a suit in equity, in addition to the profits to be accounted for, the damages the complainant has sustained by the infringements complained of;" so as to read:

Nothing contained in this section shall affect the right of the plaintiff to an injunction, nor to recover in a suit in equity, in addition to the profits to be accounted for, the damages the complainant has sustained by the infringements complained of.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 9, before the word "court" to insert "said."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, line 5, after the word "and," to insert "subject to such rules and regulations as the Supreme Court may establish;" so that the section will read:

The several courts vested with jurisdiction of cases arising under the patent laws may, at any time during the pendency of any patent cause, grant or suspend the issuing or operation of an injunction upon such terms as the court may impose, and, subject to such rules and regulations as the Supreme Court may establish, shall have like power after an appeal of said cause, and while the same is pending in the Supreme Court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 10, after the word "invention," to strike out "shown in the model or drawings, or described in the original specification or its amendments, and to which he would have been entitled;" so as to make the clause read:

Section 4916 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows: Whenever any patent is inoperative or invalid, by reason of a defective or insufficient specification, or by reason of the patentee claiming as his own invention or discovery more or less than he had a right to claim as new, if the error has arisen by inadvertence, accident, or mistake, and without any fraudulent or deceptive intention, the Commissioner shall, on the surrender of such patent and the payment of the duty required by law, cause a new patent for the same invention, and in accordance with the corrected specification, to be issued to the patentee, or in the case of his death, or of an assignment of the whole or any undivided part of the original patent, then to his executors, administrators, or assigns, for the unexpired part of the term of the original patent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 25, before the word "restriction," to strike out "and," and after "restriction" to insert "and rejection;" so as to read:

The specifications and claim in every such case shall be subject to revision, restriction, and rejection, in the same manner as original applications are.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, after the word "act," in line 30, to insert:

But no new matter shall be introduced into the specification not shown, contained, or substantially indicated in the specification or drawings of the original application or its amendments.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 40, after the word "shown," to strike out "in the model or drawings, or described in the original specification or" and insert "contained, or substantially indicated in the specification or drawings of the original application and;" so as to read:

In any suit at law or in equity upon a patent hereafter reissued, the defendant, having given notice or pleaded the same in the manner set forth in the forty-ninehundred and twentieth section of the Revised Statutes, may prove in defense of the whole patent, or any of the claims thereof, that the new patent, or any claim thereof, is not for the same invention shown, contained, or substantially indicated in the specification or drawings of the original application and its amendments, and to which he would have been entitled.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, line 12, after the word "examined," to insert "the facts proposed to be proved by each;" so as to read:

Any person who may wish to perpetuate testimony to be used in any patent suit then pending, or which may thereafter be brought, may do so subject to the following rules and conditions: he may file a bill or petition in the circuit court of any district in which the parties having a right to sue for infringement of said patent, or against whom he shall desire to use testimony to be taken hereunder, or any of them, reside or may be found, setting forth the date, number, and subject of the patent, and the name of the patentee, the names and residences of the several parties interested in said patent, so far as known to him, the names of witnesses proposed to be examined, the facts proposed to be proved by each, and his desire to perpetuate testimony, as aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, line 15, after the word "court," to insert "if it deems it just and reasonable so to do;" and in line 16, after the word "directing," to insert "before whom and;" so as to read:

On the said parties being brought into court in the usual way the court, if it deems it just and reasonable so to do, may enter an order or orders in the case, directing before whom and when and where, either within or without the district, the evidence shall be taken.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, after the word "and," in line 29, to strike out "then and there introduce such legal testimony of said witnesses as they may see fit, which," and insert:

The petitioners may then and there introduce such legal testimony of such witnesses as they may see fit, relating to the facts set forth in the petition; and thereupon, in relation to or in rebuttal or avoidance of the matters put in evidence by the petitioners, the respondents may introduce the legal testimony of such of said witnesses as they, or any of them, may see fit to call, and as the court, upon application in the same proceeding, may permit. The examination shall be by interrogatories, and all objections of mere form to such interrogatories shall be raised at the time or deemed to have been waived.

So as to read:

Both parties may attend at the time and place or times and places so designated by the court, or at such times and places as they may agree, and the petitioners may then and there introduce such legal testimony of such witnesses as they may see fit, relating to the facts set forth in the petition; and thereupon, in relation to or in rebuttal or avoidance of the matters put in evidence by the petitioners, the respondents may introduce the legal testimony of such of said witnesses as they, or any of them, may see fit to call, and as the court, upon application in the same proceeding, may permit. The examinations shall be by interrogatories, and all objections of mere form to such interrogatories shall be raised at the time or deemed to have been waived.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, line 32, before the word "evidence," to insert the word "the;" after the words "shall be," in the same line, to insert "certified by the person taking the same, and by him, or them, respectively, returned to the court, and;" and in line 36, after the word "received," to insert "so far as admissible;" so as to read:

The evidence, when so taken, shall be certified by the person taking the same, and by him, or them, respectively, returned to the court, and filed among the records of the court; and the same, or duly certified copies thereof, shall thereafter be received, so far as admissible, in all suits on said patent to which the said petitioners, or the said defendants, or any of them, or those claiming by, through, or under them, shall be parties; but the witnesses, if living, may be recalled in said suits, and re-examined or cross-examined, as the case may be, by any party.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, line 60, after the word "proceeding," to insert "and actually served with personal notice;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That no depositions taken under this section shall be used, except as against persons who were parties to such proceeding and actually served with personal notice, or those claiming under them by interest acquired subsequent to filing said certificate in the Patent Office.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, line 63, after the word "and," to insert the words "provided, that," and after the word "cause," in line 66, to insert:

Except that if the party producing it in such case shows any sufficient cause then existing for using the same, it may be admitted; but whenever testimony taken hereunder by the petitioners shall be used, testimony taken in the same proceeding by the respondents, in relation to or in rebuttal or avoidance of the matters referred to by said evidence of the petitioners, may be used by the party against whom said evidence of the petitioners is used.

So as to read:

And provided, That no such depositions shall be used in any action at law when the witness is alive, competent to testify, and within the United States during any time when his testimony could be regularly taken in the cause, except that if the party producing it in such case shows any sufficient cause then existing for using the same, it may be admitted; but whenever testimony taken hereunder by the petitioners shall be used, testimony taken in the same proceeding by the respondents, in relation to or in rebuttal or avoidance of the matters referred to by said evidence of the petitioners, may be used by the party against whom said evidence of the petitioners is used.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 10, line 4, to insert after the word "shall" the words "within a reasonable time;" so as to read:

Whenever any person shall be injured by a claim by the owners of any patent, or the parties entitled to sue thereon, or their agents, that he is infringing the same, made publicly or by notice to customers or consumers, and no suit shall, within a reasonable time, be brought and prosecuted to enforce such claim, he may file a petition in equity, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction of patent causes, to compel the person making such claim, or on whose behalf it is made, to bring or cause to be brought a suit on said patent, to test its validity and the question of its infringement by those acts which are so claimed to constitute an infringement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 11, line 5, before the word "patent," to insert the word "original;" in line 8, before the word "patent," to insert the word "original," and at the end of the section to insert the following:

It shall be the duty of the Commissioner to keep a record of said payments; and a receipt therefor, or a certificate that the payment has been made, sealed and executed in the manner provided by law for certified copies, shall be conclusive evidence of the payment; and, upon request, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner to cause such a certificate to be indorsed upon or annexed to the letters-patent.

So as to make the section read:

On each and every patent for an invention issued after the passage of this act there shall be paid to the Commissioner a duty, as follows, namely: Fifty dollars, to be paid on or before the 1st day of January occurring next after the expiration of four years from the date of the original patent, and $100 on or before the 1st day of January occurring next after the expiration of nine years from the date of the original patent; and in default of any such payment the patent shall expire on the 1st day of April next thereafter; but the Commissioner, for good cause shown, may allow the payment to be made at any time before such 1st day of April, in which case the patent shall not become void. The Commissioner shall annually, in the month of April, publish a list of the patents which have expired for non-payment of duties. Patents issued under this law shall contain a notification of the annual duties to be paid and the time of such payments. It shall be the duty of the Commissioner to keep a record of said payments; and a receipt therefor, or a certificate that the payment has been made, sealed, and executed in the manner provided by law for certified copies, shall be conclusive evidence of the payment; and upon request it shall be the duty of the Commissioner to cause such a certificate to be indorsed upon or annexed to the letters-patent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 12, line 13, to strike out the words "one month" and insert "two months;" so as to read:

An assignment, grant, conveyance, or exclusive license, as aforesaid, shall be void as against any subsequent purchaser, mortgagee, or licensee for a valuable consideration, without notice, unless it is recorded in the Patent-Office within two months from the execution thereof, or before the execution of such subsequent grant, conveyance, or license.

The amendment was agreed to

The next amendment was, in section 14, line 1, after the word "whoever," to insert the words "with intent to defraud;" so as to make the section read:

Whoever, with intent to defraud, conveys any interest in any patent or grants any license thereunder, knowing that the interest or right so purporting to be granted or conveyed has been previously granted in whole or in part to another, without, before the payment, either by note or otherwise, of the consideration, or any part thereof, informing the grantee or grantees of the existence or nature of such incumbrance or prior right, so far as he has actual knowledge thereof, shall, for every such offense, be punished by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by fine not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 16, line 7, after the word "price," to insert "and for uncertified manuscript copies the reasonable cost of making the same;" so as to read:

Section 493 of the Revised Statutes shall be, and hereby is, amended so as to read as follows: The price to be paid for uncertified printed copies of specifications and drawings of patents shall be determined by the Commissioner of Patents, within the limits of actual cost as the minimum, and fifty cents as the maximum price, and for uncertified manuscript copies the reasonable cost of making the same; and the price to be charged for certified copies shall be the same as for uncertified copies, with the addition of twenty-five cents for the certificate and seal.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out section 20 of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 20. Section 4894 of the Revised Statutes shall be, and hereby is, amended so as to read as follows: All applications for patents shall be completed and prepared for examination within two years after the filing of the application, and in default thereof, or upon failure of the applicant to prosecute the same within two years after any action therein, of which notice shall have been sent to the applicant or his agent, they shall be regarded as abandoned by the parties thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section [21] 20, line 12, after the word word "owners," to insert the words "or in case of death or disability, his or her legal representative;" so as to read:

And in all cases of an application by an assignee for the issue of a patent, the specification shall be signed and sworn to by the inventor or discoverer; and in all cases of an application for a reissue of any patent, the application may be made and the corrected specification sworn to and signed by the owner or owners, or in case of death or disability, his or her legal representative, of the entire interest in the patent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to insert, after section 20, the following additional section:

SEC. 21. Any person who has an interest in an invention or discovery, whether as inventor, discoverer, or assignee, for which a patent was ordered to issue upon the payment of the final fee, but who fails to make payment thereof within six months from the time at which it was passed and allowed, and notice thereof was sent to the applicant or his agent, shall have a right to make an application for a patent for such invention or discovery the same as in the case of an original application. But such second application, in order to be a continuation of the original application, must be made within two years after the allowance thereof. But no person shall be held responsible in damages for the manufacture or use of any article or thing for which a patent was ordered to issue under such renewed application prior to the issue of the patent. And upon the hearing of renewed applications preferred under this section, abandonment shall be considered as a question of fact.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out section 22 of the bill, in the following words:

Section 4897 of the Revised Statutes shall be, and hereby is, repealed; but in the case of any patent which, prior to the passage of this act, has been ordered to issue, and has been forfeited for non-payment of the final fee, the renewed application provided for by said section may be made within six months from the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of section [23] 22 the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That this section shall only be applicable to patents hereafter granted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section [24] 23, line 7, to strike out, after the word "interest," the words "as the case may be," and in line 12, after the word "examiners-in-chief," to strike out the words "or of the Commissioner or Assistant Commissioner, as the case may be."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section [24] 23, line 27, after the words "prior date to the," to strike out the words "application of the;" so as to read:

That in the case of reissues no interference shall be declared with any patent of later date than that sought to be reissued, except when the original application for such subsequent patent is shown by the office records to have been of prior date to the patent sought to be reissued, nor with any application for a patent filed subsequent to the date of the patent sought to be reissued.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The amendments of the committee are gone through with. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and still open to amendment.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The Senator from California [Mr. BOOTH] has proposed certain amendments to the bill which I desire to have acted upon.

Mr. BOOTH. I gave notice several days ago that when this bill came up for consideration to-day I would offer some amendments to it. It is only proper to say that while these amendments have not been formally passed upon by the Committee on Patents, I was requested by the committee to offer them for the consideration of the Senate. The desire of the author of the bill, the Senator from New Hampshire, is that they shall be accepted with the amendments of the committee just agreed to, so that they may be printed with the bill as amended. If there is no objection, I will offer the amendments which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments proposed by the Senator from California will be reported in their order. The first amendment proposed by him will be reported.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to substitute for section 2 the following:

SEC. 2. In all suits for the infringement of a patent, in which, at the date of the passage of this act, no final verdict has been rendered, or no decree for an account or assessment of damages has been pronounced, the measure of the plaintiff's recovery shall be the same, both in law and in equity. If a license fee has already been established by a reasonable number of transactions applicable to the case at bar, such license fee, or a portion thereof, according to the extent and duration of the infringement proved, shall be the measure of the plaintiff's recovery in all cases, except in cases where the defendant has made an actual profit from making for sale, or selling the thing patented, or the product thereof; and in such cases the proportion of the actual profit of such making for sale or selling, due to said infringement, shall be determined, and that proportion of such actual profit shall be the measure of the plaintiff's recovery; and in an action at law the court may appoint an auditor to ascertain the same, and his report shall be prima facie evidence; but if such proportion shall not be equal to the amount of a license fee established, or to be determined, in the manner hereinafter provided, the plaintiff shall be entitled to recover such amount, or so much thereof as shall be in excess of the profits so awarded.

If a license fee has not already been established by a reasonable number of transactions applicable to the case at bar, a license fee for the use actually made shall be determined from all the evidence in the case; and if the case shall not fall within the exception aforesaid the same shall be adopted as the measure of the plaintiff's recovery.

And whenever the court shall be of opinion that the suit of the plaintiff, or the defense of the defendant, was vexatious and malicious, or the infringement was willful, the court may award against the defeated party such sum, by way of counsel fees and expenses of suit, as it shall deem just and reasonable.

No account of savings shall in any case be allowed; and no evidence or account of the defendant's profits shall in any case be admitted, except as to actual profits resulting from making for sale or selling the thing patented, or the product thereof as aforesaid: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall exclude other evidence as to the utility and advantage of the invention as one element to aid in determining a license fee where none has been established. Nothing contained in this section shall affect the right of a plaintiff to an injunction.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from California will be reported.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 5, so as to read as follows:

SEC. 5. Section 4916 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows: Whenever any patent is inoperative or invalid, by reason of a defective or insufficient specification, or by reason of the patentee claiming as his own invention or discovery more or less than he had a right to claim as new, if the error has arisen by inadvertence, accident, or mistake, and without any fraudulent or deceptive intention, the Commissioner shall, on the surrender of such patent and the payment of the duty required by law, cause a new patent for the same invention and in accordance with the corrected specification, to be issued to the patentee, or in the case of his death, or of an assignment of the whole or any undivided part of the original patent, then to his executors, administrators, or assigns, for the unexpired part of the term of the original patent. Such surrender shall take effect upon the issue of the amended patent. The Commissioner may, in his discretion, cause several patents to be issued for distinct and separate parts of the thing patented upon demand of the applicant, and upon payment of the required fee for a reissue for each of such reissued letters-patent. The specifications and claim in every such case shall be subject to revision, restriction, and rejection, in the same manner as original applications are. Every patent so reissued, together with the corrected specification, shall have the same effect and operation in law, on the trial of all actions for causes thereafter arising, as if the same had been originally filed in such corrected form, except as otherwise provided in this act; but no new matter shall be introduced into the specification not shown, contained, or substantially indicated in the specification or drawings of the original application or its amendments, and which he would have been entitled to include as a part of his invention in the patent originally granted. But no reissue shall be allowed, unless applied for within seven years from the date of the original patent, or within four years from the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. BOOTH. There is a clerical error in line 31. The word "he" should be stricken out, and the words "the patentee" inserted; so as to read:

And which the patentee would have been entitled to include as a part of his invention in the patent originally granted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will make the correction suggested by the Senator from California. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from California just reported.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 7 by striking out, in line 9, the words "as a clerical error;" also, by striking out, in line 11, the word "or," where it first occurs, and inserting in place thereof the word "and;" and by striking out in said line the words "or both."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 8 by striking out, in line 8, the words "or may be found;" also, by inserting in line 11, after the word "names," the words "and residences;" also, by inserting in line 13, after the word "each," the words "as the same, would have to be stated in an answer in equity;" also, in line 23, by inserting after the words "of such" the words "of said;" in line 27, by striking out the words "of said;" in line 33, by inserting after the word "person" the words "or persons;" in line 36, by striking out the word "admissible" and inserting in place thereof the word "competent;" in line 48, by inserting, after the word "office," the words "and within thirty days after said testimony is returned into said court, the clerk thereof shall make a copy of the petition and testimony, at the complainant's or petitioner's costs, and file the same in the Patent Office;" in lines 52 and 53, by striking out the words "or may be found;" in line 65, by striking out the words "United States" and inserting in place thereof the words "jurisdiction of the court."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 9, in lines 19 and 20, by striking out the words "adjudging said patent, or any claim thereof, to be void" and inserting in place thereof the word "therein;" also, by striking out from and including the word "certificate," in line 21, to and including the word "void," in line 24, and inserting in place thereof the words "certified copy of the decree;" in line 24, by striking out the word "certificate" and inserting in place thereof the word "copy;" also, by inserting, at the end of line 28, "and the costs thereof shall be taxed as costs of the cause;" also, in line 36, strike out the words "or are found."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 10 by striking out, in line 7, the words "of patent causes;" also, by inserting, in line 21, after the word "bring," the words "or cause to be brought."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 11 by striking out, in line 3, the word "duty," and inserting in place thereof the word "fee;" in lines 15 and 16, by striking out the word "duties" and inserting in place thereof, respectively, the word "fees;" also, in line 16, by striking out the word "annual."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 12 by striking out all of lines 8, 9, 10, and 11, and inserting in place thereof "States. An assignment, grant, or conveyance, or a license exclusive as to purpose or territory, shall be void as against any subsequent purchaser or mortgagee of said patent or licensee thereunder for a valuable."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 19 by adding at the end thereof: "But nothing herein contained shall have the effect to revive any patent heretofore expired, nor to extend the term of any existing patent."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. WHYTE. Now that the proposed amendments have been agreed to, I hope before the bill is reported to the Senate it may be printed as amended, so that we may understand what the amendments are. I also understand that there is a reservation in regard to the amendments that have been agreed to as in Committee of the Whole that a separate vote may be taken on each amendment in the Senate if any Senator chooses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the rule a vote will be taken on the amendments in the Senate. It is the right of a Senator to demand a separate vote upon concurring in any amendment.

Mr. BOOTH. I should like to inquire if the bill as amended will be printed without further order of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be printed without further order of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Will it be printed as reported to the Senate or printed as in Committee of the Whole? I understood the Senator from Maryland to suggest that it be reported to the Senate. I suggest to him that it had better remain as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WHYTE. That is what I said, that it should be printed as amended before the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg the Senator's pardon; I misunderstood him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be printed as amended in Committee of the Whole. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at three o'clock and sixteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 11, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. No. 763) to provide for holding term of the circuit and district courts in the district of Colorado. I will state to the House that I think there will be no debate on this bill.

Mr. WOOD. I would suggest that by unanimous consent we go to the Speaker's table for the purpose of referring the bills now there, so that we may have them in committee, whence that may be reported back again, for examination. It is obvious that a good deal of time is consumed by individual gentlemen rising here at any moment and asking that particular bills be taken from the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. If the suggestion of the gentleman from New York should be adopted it would relieve the Chair very much.

Mr. WOOD. My object is to avoid that loss of time by clearing the table.

Mr. HALE. What is the proposition?

The SPEAKER. That the House, by unanimous consent, go to business on the Speaker's table and take up the bills thereon, for reference only.

Mr. HALE. With the understanding that in every case a single objection makes the bill remain on the Speaker's table?

Mr. EDEN. And no bills to come back on motions to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. That would be the understanding.

Mr. HALE. Let it be clearly understood that if objection be made the bills remain on the Speaker's table.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask leave to introduce a bill for reference to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Has objection been made to my motion in reference to a particular bill on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. WOOD. I would suggest to the gentleman from Colorado that his object will be attained if my proposition is acceded to.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Not at all. I do not desire to have my bill referred. I ask for action upon it. It is important there should be action upon it at the present time. It is a bill which has reference to the holding of courts in our State. I have an amendment to offer to the Senate bill, in regard to which I have consulted gentlemen on the Judiciary Committee, and I think it will occupy but a few moments. It will give the courts in our State the facilities which are needed.

Mr. WOOD. I do not object to the request of the gentleman from Colorado.

TERM OF COURT IN COLORADO.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado, who asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time the bill (S. No. 763) to provide for holding term of the circuit and district courts in the district of Colorado?

Mr. EDEN. Let the bill first be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the circuit and district courts of the district of Colorado may, when the public interests require it, order a special term, to be held at such time and place as said courts may designate: Provided, That no special term of the circuit court shall be held except with the consent of the circuit judge of the circuit that the circuit or district court may order a grand or petit jury, or both, to attend such special term, by an order entered of record at least thirty days before the day on which such special term shall convene. Notice of such special term shall be published weekly for four consecutive weeks in a newspaper published at the capital of the State. And when a circuit and district court shall be held at the same time and place, the same panel of jurors shall serve in both courts.

Mr. REAGAN. If the bill will give rise to debate I must object to its present consideration.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. It will give rise to no debate. I desire to offer an amendment which was unanimously adopted by the House in the form of a bill last session.

Mr. BURCHARD. If the bill is to be amended I think it should be referred.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that I have already consulted a majority of the members of the Judiciary Committee, and they are satisfied with the bill and amendment. If the amendment be adopted the bill with the amendment will go back to the Senate and will then go to a committee of conference if the Senate should not adopt the amendment. I respectfully ask gentlemen to permit this action to be taken. It is a matter of the greatest importance to the people of our State.

Mr. BURCHARD. I have no objection to the committee having leave to report the bill back at any time.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. The amendment I offer is a bill which was reported unanimously from the Committee on the Judiciary at the last session and passed the House unanimously. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw his objection.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Colorado a question. Was the amendment submitted to the members of the Judiciary Committee severally and did we agree to it?

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I submitted it to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] and to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and other members of the committee and they agreed to it.

Mr. FRYE. My impression is that we had no objection to the amendment and were quite satisfied with it.

Mr. BURCHARD. Let the amendment be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add to the bill the following sections:

SEC. 2. That for the trial and determination of all causes and proceedings cognizable and triable in the district court of the United States for the district of Colorado, as established by the act entitled "An act to further the administration of justice in the State of Colorado," approved June 26, 1876, the said district shall be separated into three divisions, as follows: All that part of said district lying within the following-named counties as now constituted, to wit: the counties of Bent, Las Animas, Pueblo, Huerfano, Fremont, and Custer shall constitute the southern division, and a regular term of said court for said division shall be held annually at Pueblo, to commence on the first Tuesday in February; all that part of said district lying within the following-named counties, to wit: the counties of Costilla, Conejos, Rio Grande, Saguache, Lake, Gunnison, Hinsdale, San Juan, Ouray, and La Plata, together with all that part of the Ute Indian reservation lying south of the thirty-ninth degree of north latitude in said State, shall constitute the western division, and a regular term of said court for said division shall be held annually at Del Norte, to commence on the first Tuesday in August; and the residue of the State of Colorado shall constitute the northern division, and two regular terms of said court for said division shall be held annually at Denver, to commence on the first Tuesday in May and on the first Tuesday in October. And should the judge of said district court fail to attend at the time and place of holding any one of the regular terms of the court for either of the said divisions of the aforesaid district, before the close of the fourth day of any such term, the business pending in such court shall stand adjourned to the next regular term thereof: Provided, That whenever the judge of said court, from any cause, shall fail to hold a regular term of said court for either of said divisions, it shall be his duty, if in his opinion the business in said court shall require, to hold an intermediate term of said court, at such time as he shall, by his order in writing, direct, addressed to the clerk and marshal of said court, at least thirty days previous to the commencement of said term, and to be published in the several newspapers published in the bounds of said divisions, the same length of time; and at any and all such intermediate terms the business of any such courts, of every nature and description whatsoever, shall have reference to, and be proceeded with, in the same manner as if the same were a regular term of the said court. And all issues of fact shall be tried at a term of said court to be held in the division where such suit should hereafter be commenced in accordance with the third section of this act. But nothing herein contained shall prevent the said district court from regulating, by general rule, the venue of transitory actions either in law or in equity, and from changing the same for a good cause to be shown.

SEC. 3. That all issues now pending in the said district court shall be tried at the places above prescribed for holding such court within the division where the cause of action may have arisen, unless otherwise ordered by said court, in pursuance of the authority given in the first section of this act; and no process issued or proceedings pending in the said district court shall be avoided or impaired by this change of the time and place of holding such court; but all process, bail bonds, and recognizances returnable at the next term of said court shall be returnable and returned to the court next held at the appropriate place, according to this act, in the same manner as if so made returnable on the face thereof, and shall have full effect accordingly; and all continuances may be made to conform to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. That all suits and proceedings hereafter to be brought in the said district court, not of a local nature, shall be brought in a court of the division of the district where the defendant resides; but if there be more than one defendant, and they reside in different divisions of the district, the plaintiff may sue in either division and send duplicate writ or writs to the other defendants, on which the plaintiff or his attorney shall indorse that the writ thus sent is a copy of a writ sued out of a court of the proper division of the said district; and the said writs, when executed and returned into the office from which they issued, shall constitute one suit and be proceeded in accordingly.

SEC. 5. The clerk of the district court for the district of Colorado shall appoint a deputy clerk for said court held at Pueblo and a deputy clerk for said court held at Del Norte, who shall reside and keep their offices at said places respectively. And the said clerk shall reside and keep his office at Denver. Each deputy shall keep in his office full records of all actions and proceedings in the district court held at the same place, and shall have the same power to issue all process from the said court that is or may be given to the clerks of other district courts in like cases.

SEC. 6. That the district attorney and marshal of the district of Colorado shall respectively perform the duties of district attorney and marshal of and for the southern, western, and northern divisions of the district of Colorado as established by this act; and the said marshal shall keep an office and deputy at each of the places where the sessions of the said district court are directed to be held.

SEC. 7. That in addition to the ordinary jurisdiction and powers of a district court of the United States with which the district court of Colorado has been invested, it be, and is hereby, invested, within the limits of the said southern and western divisions of same, with the exercise of concurrent jurisdiction and power, in all civil cases, now exercised by the circuit courts of the United States; and that in all cases where said court shall exercise such jurisdiction writs of error and appeals shall be allowed and taken from the judgment, orders, or decrees of said court to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner and upon the same conditions as appeals may be taken from the circuit courts.

SEC. 8. Any person charged with violating any of the penal or criminal statutes of the United States of which the said district court has jurisdiction shall be proceeded against, by indictment or otherwise, within the division of said district wherein the alleged offense was committed, and shall have his or her trial at a term of the said district court held in the said division, unless for cause shown the judge shall otherwise direct; and grand and petit juries shall be summoned for the several terms of said district court in manner as is now, or may be, provided by law; and jurors shall be selected and drawn from the division of the said district in which they reside and in which the term of the said district court to which they are summoned is held.

SEC. 9. A term of the circuit court of the eighth judicial circuit shall be held at Denver, in said State, upon the first Tuesday in May and the first Tuesday in October in each year. One grand jury and one petit jury shall be summoned, and serve in both the said circuit and district courts, the terms of which are to be held in Denver.

SEC. 10. All acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5484) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1880; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I give notice that I will call up the bill to-morrow, after the morning hour.

Mr. FOSTER. I reserve all points of order.

ANDREW MUCKLE.

Mr. HUBBELL. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for consideration at this time a bill which should be considered and passed at once, if the relief asked for is to be given.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill, which was read, directs that the Adjutant-General of the Army remove any charge of desertion which may stand on his record against Andrew Muckle, late a private in Company F, Fifteenth Regiment Michigan Infantry Volunteers, and to forthwith grant him an honorable discharge.

The second section directs the Commissioner of the General Land Office to extend the time for proving up the homestead entry of the said Andrew Muckle, No. 2745, made at the United States land office then at Traverse City, Michigan, on the 2d day of January, 1872, for one year from the 2d day of January, 1879.

Mr. REAGAN. I think I must call for the regular order.

Mr. HUBBELL. There is a petition and there are also affidavits of parties accompanying this bill, and if gentlemen will hear them read I am sure they will allow the bill to pass at once.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Has this bill been referred to and considered by the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. HUBBELL. It has not. It came to me yesterday. If the bill shall be referred it will be of no use to the party, because the relief prayed for must be had before the 2d day of January next or he will lose his homestead. If the relief is not granted by that time, this party must lose the homestead upon which by the 2d of January next he will have lived the full time required by law.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 5485) was received, read three several times, and passed.

Mr. HUBBELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF WATCHMEN IN TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HOOKER, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of watchmen of the Treasury Department, praying that their pay be increased to $60 per month; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. REAGAN. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that House bill No. 3547 is now in a position before the House with the main question ordered. More than once at the last session the House declined to proceed with the consideration of the bill. On the 11th day of May last the main question was ordered upon the bill; and on the Monday following, the 13th of May, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. REAGAN. The object being to present a substitute for the entire bill.

The SPEAKER. Subsequently thereto the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] by unanimous consent, presented an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the original bill and amendment.

Mr. HALE. Is there not a special order that comes up to-day by virtue of assignment, and must not the House first settle what business it will take up?

The SPEAKER. It is entirely within the province of the House to determine at all times what business it will proceed with. There seems to be two orders for to-day: the first is the bill (H. R. No. 3547) to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers, on which bill the main question has been ordered. That order must clearly be executed; but the House can decline to proceed with it at this time, just as on several occasions at the last session it declined to proceed with the consideration of the bill. If the House shall now refuse to consider the bill, then of course the special order will come up, which is the bill (H. R. No. 4553) to provide for the further distribution of the moneys received under the Geneva award. If the House shall refuse to consider the interstate commerce bill, and the Geneva award bill shall come up, then after the disposition of that bill the interstate commerce bill will again come up.

Mr. HALE. My point was that the House should settle now what bill it will take up before any bill is read. Perhaps the gentleman in charge of the Geneva award bill [Mr. KNOTT] will consent to taking up the other bill first.

The SPEAKER. The main question is operating on the bill known as the interstate commerce bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Has not the interstate commerce bill the preference, unless the House shall postpone it?

The SPEAKER. The House can refuse to consider it, if the question of consideration is raised.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I hope it will not be.

Mr. POTTER. If the interstate commerce bill is now considered, will the Geneva award bill come up afterward?

The SPEAKER. Immediately afterward.

Mr. KNOTT. I understand the Speaker to state that the previous question is prevailing upon the interstate commerce bill and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER. So the record shows.

Mr. KNOTT. That being the case, must not the vote upon the bill be taken necessarily within an hour?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] can answer that better than the Chair. The Chair will state that the debate upon the bill cannot be continued beyond an hour without unanimous consent.

Mr. REAGAN. Should the main question be reconsidered and the substitute offered, will it not then be open to amendment under the five-minute rule?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the vote cannot be reconsidered by which the main question was ordered, because more than two days have transpired since that time.

Mr. REAGAN. The amendments which I desire to offer to the substitute are merely to strike out a few words. The substitute has been prepared with great care, and I would myself prefer to have the substitute read by sections and considered under the five-minute rule, until we get through with it in that way.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. KNOTT. I object to that.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I ask consent to offer three amendments which I hold in my hand, and upon which I would like to have the action of the House.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask unanimous consent; and I am sure no member will object, because it is necessary for the perfection of the bill that several words in two or three different places should be struck out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas desires unanimous consent to modify the amendment heretofore offered by him in the nature of a substitute, on which the previous question is operating. His object, as the Chair understands, is to make the amendment clearer. The Clerk will read the modifications which the gentleman proposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 1, lines 11 and 12, strike out the words "rendered at the same time."

In section 2, lines 5, 6, and 7, strike out the words "which rebate, drawback, or advantage is not allowed to all other persons for whom like services are performed."

In section 3, lines 4 and 5, strike out the words "for the purpose of defeating the intention of this act."

Mr. REAGAN. I ask that these modifications may be made by unanimous consent.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to ask a parliamentary question. The main question having been ordered, the gentleman from Texas, as I understand, is now entitled to an hour. Will consent to the admission of these modifications at all change his right in that respect?

The SPEAKER. It will not; the time to which the gentleman is entitled will not be changed. The gentleman asks to have these modifications made by unanimous consent, his object being, as the Chair is advised, to make clearer the meaning of the substitute. The Chair will cause the whole substitute to be read, because a long time has elapsed since the question was before the House; and it is desirable that members should be fully advised of the provisions of the measure before the vote is taken.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire members to understand that this amendment removes from the bill verbiage which was before objected to, and makes other changes from the bill formerly discussed. I hope, therefore, that gentlemen will give their attention to the reading.

The SPEAKER. The substitute on which the vote is about to be taken will be read, with the modifications proposed by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons, engaged alone or associated with others in the transportation of property by railroad from one State or Territory to or through one or more other States or Territories of the United States, or to or from any foreign country, directly or indirectly to charge to or receive from any person or persons any greater or less rate or amount of freight, compensation, or reward than is charged to or received from any other person or persons for like and cotemporaneous service, in the carrying, receiving, delivering, storing, or handling of the same. And all persons, engaged as aforesaid, shall furnish, without discrimination, the same facilities for the carriage, receiving, delivery, storage, and handling of all property of like character carried by him or them, and shall perform with equal expedition the same kind of services connected with the cotemporaneous transportation thereof as aforesaid. No break, stoppage, or interruption, nor any contract, agreement, or understanding, shall be made to prevent the carriage of any property from being and being treated as one continuous carriage, in the meaning of this act, from the place of shipment to the place of destination, unless such stoppage, interruption, contract, arrangement, or understanding was made in good faith for some practical and necessary purpose, without any intent to avoid or interrupt such continuous carriage, or to evade any of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property, as aforesaid, directly or indirectly to allow any rebate, drawback, or other advantage, in any form, upon shipments made or services rendered, as aforesaid, by him or them.

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the carriage, receiving, storage, or handling of property, as mentioned in the first section of this act, to enter into any combination, contract, or agreement, by changes of schedule, carriage in different cars, breaking car-loads into less than car-loads, or by any other means, with intent to prevent the carriage of such property from being continuous from the place of shipment to the place of destination, whether carried on one or several railroads. And it shall be unlawful for any person or persons carrying property, as aforesaid, to enter into any contract, agreement, or combination, for the pooling of freights, or to pool the freights, of different and competing railroads by dividing between them the aggregate or net proceeds of the earnings of such railroads, or any portion of them.

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property, as provided in the first section of this act, to charge or receive any greater compensation per car-load of similar property for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same for a shorter than for a longer distance in one continuous carriage.

SEC. 5. That all persons engaged in carrying property, as provided in the first section of this act, shall adopt and keep posted up schedules, which shall plainly state:

First, the different kinds and classes of property to be carried;

Second, the different places between which such property shall be carried;

Third, the rates of freight and prices of carriage between such places, and for all services connected with the receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, storing, or handling the same.

Such schedules may be changed from time to time, as hereinafter provided. Copies of such schedules shall be printed in plain, large type, at least the size of ordinary pica, and shall be kept plainly posted for public inspection in at least two places in every depot where freights are received or delivered; and no such schedule shall be changed in any particular except by the substitution of another schedule containing the specifications above required, which substitute schedule shall plainly state the time when it shall go into effect, and copies of which, printed as aforesaid, shall be posted as above provided, at least five days before the same shall go into effect; and the same shall remain in force until another schedule shall, as aforesaid, be substituted. And it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in carrying property on railroads as aforesaid, after thirty days after the passage of this act, to charge or receive more or less compensation for the carriage, receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, handling, or storing of any of the property contemplated by the first section of this act than shall be specified in such schedule as may at the time be in force.

SEC. 6. That each and all of the provisions of this act shall apply to all property, and the receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, handling, storing, or carriage of the same, on one actually or substantially continuous carriage, or as part of such continuous carriage, as provided for in the first section of this act, and the compensation therefor, whether such property be carried wholly on one railroad or partly on several railroads, and whether such services are performed or compensation paid or received by or to one person alone or in connection with another or other persons.

SEC. 7. That each and every act, matter, or thing in this act declared to be unlawful is hereby prohibited; and in case any person or persons, as defined in this act, engaged as aforesaid, shall do, suffer or permit to be done, any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or forbidden, or shall omit to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, or shall be guilty of any violation of the provisions of this act, such person or persons shall forfeit and pay to the person or persons who may sustain damage thereby a sum equal to three times the amount of the damages so sustained, to be recovered by the person or persons so damaged by suit in any district or circuit court of the United States, where the person or persons causing such damage can be found, or may have an agent, office, or place of business; and the person or persons so offending shall for each offense forfeit and pay a penalty of not less than $1,000, to be recovered by the United States, by action in any circuit or district court aforesaid, one-half of such penalty or penalties, when collected, to be paid to the informer. Any action to be brought as aforesaid to recover any such penalty or damages may be considered, and if so brought shall be regarded, as a subject of equity jurisdiction, and discovery and affirmative relief may be sought and obtained therein. In any such action so brought as a case of equitable cognizance, preliminary or final injunctions may, without allegation or proof of damage to any plaintiff or complainant, be granted upon proper application, restraining, forbidding, and prohibiting the commission or continuance of any acts, matters, or things, within the terms or purview of this act, prohibited or forbidden. In any action aforesaid, and upon any application for any injunction above provided for, any director, officer, receiver, or trustee of any corporation or company aforesaid, or any receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or any agent of any such corporation or company, receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or of any of them alone or with any other person or persons, party or parties, may and shall be compelled to attend, appear, and testify and give evidence, and no claim that any such testimony or evidence might or might tend to criminate the person testifying or giving evidence shall be of any avail, but such evidence or testimony shall not be used as against such person on the trial of any indictment against him. The attendance and appearance of any of the persons who as aforesaid may be compelled to appear or testify, and the giving of the testimony or evidence by the same, respectively, and the production of books and papers thereby, may and shall be compelled, the same as in the case of any other witness; and in case any such deposition or evidence, or the production of any books or papers, may be desired or required for the purpose of applying for or sustaining any injunction aforesaid, the same, and the production of books and papers, may and shall be had, taken, and compelled, by or before any United States commissioner, or in any manner provided or to be provided for, as to the taking of other depositions or evidence, or the attendance of witnesses, or the production of other books or papers, in or by chapter 17 of title 13 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. In actions to be brought as aforesaid, damages sustained in the period of a month or part of a month may be regarded as and counted or declared upon, or complained of generally, and as one separate cause of action, and so, whether such damages be sustained in one month or in different months; and such separate causes of action may be joined in the same action. No action aforesaid shall be sustained unless brought within one year after the cause of action shall accrue.

SEC. 8. That any director or officer of any corporation or company acting or engaged as aforesaid, or any receiver or trustee, lessee, or person acting or engaged as aforesaid, or any agent of any such corporation or company, receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or of one of them alone, or with any other corporation, company, person, or party, who shall directly or indirectly do, or cause or willingly suffer or permit to be done, any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or forbidden, or directly or indirectly aid or abet therein; or shall directly or indirectly omit or fail to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, or cause or willingly suffer or permit any act, matter, or thing so directed or required to be done not to be so done; or shall directly or indirectly aid or abet any such omission or failure; or shall directly or indirectly be guilty of any infraction of this act, or directly or indirectly aid or abet therein, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $1,000.

SEC. 9. That nothing in this act shall apply to the carriage, receiving, storage, handling, or forwarding of property less than an ordinary car-load, or wholly within one State or Territory, and not destined for carriage in another State or Territory, or going to or coming from some foreign country, or to property carried for the United States at lower rates of freight and charges than for the general public, or to the transportation of articles free or at reduced rates of freight for charitable purposes, or to or from public fairs and expositions for exhibition.

SEC. 10. That the words "person or persons" as used in this act, except where otherwise provided, shall be construed and held to mean person or persons, officer or officers, corporation or corporations, company or companies, receiver or receivers, trustee or trustees, lessee or lessees, agent or agents, or other person or persons acting or engaged in any of the matters and things mentioned in this act.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, the bill which has been read is a substitute for the bill as reported by the Committee on Commerce. That bill, as first reported, was objected to because it was regarded as too verbose and too technical. The committee, after hearing the objections urged, having reported the measure in that form with some hesitancy, determined to accommodate the views of the House by rendering the bill less verbose and less technical; and it is proper for me to say that the committee was indebted to my young friend from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] for his valuable assistance in the revision of this bill.

In addition to this, the amended bill embraces two changes, to which I should call the attention of the House. In the fourth section of the bill as originally reported provision was made requiring schedules of State freights to be posted up, as matter of comparison, in order to prevent the charging of greater rates of freight for interstate commerce than for State commerce. A number of gentlemen, it seemed, could not understand but that this provision was an interference in some way or another with the right of the States to regulate commerce within their own territory. No such thing had been intended by the bill, and the committee thought no such inference could justly be made from its terms; but the provision was not deemed of importance enough to justify its retention against the judgment of any members of the House. Hence the provision of the original bill requiring the posting up of State rates of freight as a means of comparison has been stricken out of the bill.

The bill as originally reported contained no provision against the pooling of freights by roads running to and from the same terminal points. In this substitute we make provision against the pooling of freights.

These constitute the only material changes from the substance of the bill as first reported, the other changes being verbal, and the bill now presented having for its object the attainment of the same ends intended to be accomplished by the original bill.

Some other objections were made to the original bill. One gentleman, who is not now present, (and I shall therefore not make the criticism upon his remarks which I would if he were present,) urged that the effect of the bill, whatever the object may have been, was to aid to create and to foster monopoly; and he urged against the passage of the measure the fact that there was no railroad lobby here attempting to defeat it. He had doubtless forgotten that the bill which first passed the Senate and afterward this body, in relation to the Pacific railroads—a bill of very great moment, in which large interests were involved—did not, at least in this end of the Capitol, bring lobbyists here, so far as we knew.

But, sir, I take it that we are not driven to the alternative of determining the meaning of a bill or our duty in voting for or against it by ascertaining whether there is or is not a lobby here to oppose it. We look to the grievance complained of; we ascertain the remedies which we propose for these grievances; we submit the plan of remedy to the House; we judge the necessity by such information as we have, and of the effect of the bill by its terms, and not by what this or that person may say as to his desire to see it passed or as to its effect.

It has been urged, sir, that the bill would defeat competition. There are some gentlemen who seem to have the impression that is so. It only requires examination of the bill to see that one of its controlling objects is to secure to the commercial, producing, and consuming interests of the country the necessary legitimate competition between different lines of transportation.

The provisions of the bill are few and simple. The first section provides that rates of freight or charges shall be equal alike to all persons for like service. Can there be objection to that? Who is it that will rise on this floor and say that the power of these companies to discriminate between man and man, and community and community, ought to be exercised, or can upon any principle of justice be exercised? That these discriminations have been going on is notorious to all men. I presented a portion of the evidence in my remarks during last session. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THOMPSON] presented evidence during the last session on the same subject. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] presented other evidence on this subject. We have the evidence of this discrimination from the Board of Trade and Transportation of New York, from the Chamber of Commerce of New York City, from boards of trade and chambers of commerce of a number of leading commercial cities of the United States, and that evidence I have given to the House. We have the authority of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, approving the provisions and objects of this bill by instructing its Senators and requesting its Representatives to support it. We have the authority of the Legislature of the great State of New York, recommending to its Senators and Representatives such a bill as this.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask the gentleman from Texas whether it is this bill the Legislature of the State of New York recommends?

Mr. REAGAN. I had better refer to what the State of New York does recommend as the best answer to the gentleman. I now read, Mr. Speaker, the printed copy in the RECORD, page 3276, of the last session of Congress, of the resolutions of the State of New York:

IN ASSEMBLY, Albany, March 25, 1878.

Whereas there are now before Congress several bills seeking to provide for equity in rates of freights on property transported by common carriers in this country: Therefore,

Resolved, (if the senate concur,) That our Senators and Members of the House of Representatives, in Congress assembled, be, and they are hereby, requested to use their influence to secure the enactment of any wise and equitable law having for its object the prevention of violent and injurious fluctuations and unjust discrimination in rates of freight imposed by common carriers upon property transported by them in this country.

Resolved, That the clerk of the Assembly be directed to transmit a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolution to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from the State of New York.

By order:

EDWD. M. JOHNSON,
Clerk.

IN SENATE, April 5, 1878.

Concurred in.
By order:

JOHN W. VROOMAN,
Clerk.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman will observe that refers to what the Representatives may regard as a wise measure.

Mr. REAGAN. These resolutions were passed while this bill was pending before the House. The gentleman, of course, is the judge between himself and his constituents as to what the Legislature meant. I will say here, Mr. Speaker, that I do not expect any one to support this bill who represents capital alone. I only expect gentlemen will support it who represent the people of the United States and their interests.

Now, sir, I have already called attention to the first section, which prohibits discrimination in freight charges. The second section gives effect to the first section by providing that it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as aforesaid, directly or indirectly to allow any rebate, drawback, or other advantage in any form upon shipments made or services rendered as aforesaid by him or them. The evidence of the abuse in the allowance of rebate and drawback, the injustice of the practice, the evil which it has wrought upon the commerce of the country, the wrong done to individual citizens and communities in this country, call loudly for the passage of this bill so that the power of monopoly shall no longer be exerted by corporations to the injury of the commercial interests of the country.

The third section of the bill provides that it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the carriage, receiving, storage, or handling of property, as mentioned in the first section of this act, to enter into any combination, contract, or agreement, by changes of schedule, carriage in different cars, breaking car-loads into less than car-loads, or by any other means, with intent to prevent the carriage of such property from being continuous from the place of shipment to the place of destination, whether carried on one or several railroads. And it shall be unlawful for any person or persons carrying property, as aforesaid, to enter into any contract, agreement, or combination, for the pooling of freights, or to pool the freights, of different and competing railroads, by dividing between them the aggregate or net proceeds of the earnings of such railroads, or any portion of them.

The first part of this section is intended to prevent all subterfuges by which the intention of the law could be defeated by common carriers, and the latter part as will be seen prohibits "pooling."

Any one who reads the remarks and the evidence submitted by the gentleman from Illinois on this subject, any one who is familiar with the evidence before the Committee on Commerce upon this subject, will see and know the great necessity of reopening a competition which may exist between competing roads. Take for instance such points as Chicago and New York, where there may be three or four competing lines. It had been hoped that the power of monopoly and its injurious operations on the interests of the country would be prevented by competition; and so it would be if the competition of competing lines between the same points were in operation. But it has been wisely observed that where combination is possible competition is impossible; and in order to avoid the effect of competition, in order to prevent extending to the producing classes the advantages which would arise from competition, in order to prevent relieving the classes engaged in consumption from the benefits of competition, these roads may agree and have agreed to a plan of pooling their freights, the several roads meeting by their representatives and agreeing as to the relative amounts of business that each does upon its through trade. Having so agreed, the gross proceeds go into a common fund. They are pooled. The net proceeds are then divided between them in the proportions in which it is agreed they would do the through business; and thus competition is absolutely defeated and combination and monopoly absolutely organized against the productive and consuming interests, to the detriment and injury of the commerce of the country.

But I will not proceed with this discussion, for I think it may be safely assumed that every member of this House knows the evils of thus preventing competition and the wrongs inflicted on the great body of the people by it.

The fourth section of the bill is one that was objected to when it was up for debate before, because it required that the State schedules of freight should be posted up as a means of comparison only, in order to prevent charging greater rates of freight for interstate than for State commerce. Inasmuch as it seemed difficult for members to understand that this was not an interference with State commerce, and as the committee were very full and clear in their convictions that we neither had the power nor the right to interfere with State commerce, we thought we would avoid all offense by striking that out, and we made the section read as follows:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property, as provided in the first section of this act, to charge or receive any greater compensation per car-load of similar property for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same for a shorter than for a longer distance in one continuous carriage.

This is the section of the bill which some gentlemen have conceived interfered with competition. How, sir, is it possible that it can interfere with free competition? No part of the bill prescribes rates of freight to any company, whether they be high or low. No part of the bill requires any comparison of rates of freight between competing companies or any two companies, whether competing or not, so that each stands as free and independent as it is to-day if the bill should become a law to charge its own rates of freight, make them high or low as its interest or competition may induce, without interference by this law, being limited only by the requirement that freight shall be equal to all persons, that there shall be no drawbacks, and that like facilities shall be extended to all business.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. REAGAN. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas if the effect of this section will not be to compel the same rates for freight carried a thousand miles pro rata as for ten miles?

Mr. REAGAN. I am glad the gentleman from Kansas has asked the question, as I might possibly have omitted to speak on that point, and the question which he asks me is one which has been asked by others, and which I answer with a good deal of pleasure. There is no rate per mile required to be charged. The only limitation is that a car-load of freight going fifty miles shall not be required to pay more in the gross than a car-load of freight carried a hundred miles. And if the line of transportation be one thousand miles—I will meet precisely the view which my friend from Kansas has—if the line of transportation be one thousand miles long, and the cost of transporting one car-load of freight by that line be $100, all the bill provides upon that subject is that no more shall be charged for one hundred miles, or for five hundred miles, than is charged for one thousand miles. And right here let me say, as touching the question as to the prevention of competition, we know and recognize the fact that railroads cannot carry freight for short distances as cheaply as they can carry them for long distances, and we so leave the bill as to give them the whole margin of distance. For instance, on a line of carriage for a thousand miles we allow them to charge, if they see proper to do so, as much for carrying a car-load of freight one hundred miles as for carrying it one thousand miles; but we say, "Gentlemen, you cannot do more than this." You cannot take a course that compels people to ship their commodities away from the market in order to get a start for cheap transportation back to the market. You cannot do under this bill as has been done heretofore at Pittsburgh, where freight has been carried down the Ohio River five hundred and forty miles to Cincinnati, and there put upon competing lines of railroad and brought back through Pittsburgh and carried to Philadelphia or New York cheaper than it could have been carried directly from Pittsburgh to New York or Philadelphia.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will not the effect of this section be to prevent a company or a man who ships we will say a hundred car-loads of cattle from Kansas City from making a rate of freight at which he can carry his cattle through the State? Will he not have to pay the same rates for long distances in the State as for short distances?

Mr. REAGAN. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question, and I will endeavor to answer it. In the first section of this bill we define what interstate commerce is; and in subsequent sections we limit the operations of the bill to interstate commerce. And then in the last section of the bill we expressly exclude from the operation of the bill all State commerce. We expressly repudiate in the last section of the bill the idea that we can interfere with State commerce.

Now, that being done, I cannot understand how it can be possible that local roads can have anything to do with interstate commerce in the sense in which I understand the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PHILLIPS] to refer to it.

Mr. EDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. EDEN. It is whether railroad companies cannot overcome all the obstacles provided in the fourth section of the bill by charging higher rates for shipping from the leading points and thereby continue the rates they now charge at the intermediate points? Is there anything in the bill to prevent that?

Mr. REAGAN. There is nothing in the bill to determine what rates shall be charged on a through route. It was our express intention not to adopt any provision in the bill that could embarrass the railroads in the management of their business in any legal manner.

Mr. EDEN. Then the probability is that under this bill, instead of rates being reduced at the intermediate points, between New York and Chicago for instance, the roads will simply increase the rates between those two points so that they may continue the rates at the intermediate points.

Mr. REAGAN. There is this much in what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] says; and I do not wish anybody to vote on this bill without fully understanding its object and intent. One great object of the bill is that it shall aid in preventing those railroad wars which have hitherto been so disastrous to stockholders and so injurious to the country by the fluctuations in the prices of transportation. The object is to prevent pooling, to prevent discriminations between shippers and between places, to prevent rebates, and to compel the railroads to pursue their business in an honest and legitimate way.

And now I come to answer the gentleman. The object of the bill is to prevent railroads from compelling one part of the American people to pay for the transportation of freight belonging to another part further than the line of discrimination which we allow them, charging as much, and not more, for a short distance as for a long distance. If we can get this bill passed into a law it will not only be an instrument of justice toward the people of the country, but in my own judgment, as also in the judgment of some very able and well-informed men in relation to railroad matters, it will benefit the roads themselves by preventing what we call railroad wars.

And while I am on this point I will say a word or two to my friend from Massachusetts, whom I see here, [Mr. DEAN,] and who made some objection to this bill last session which I desire to answer now, because I think he clearly misapprehended the scope and object and effect of the bill. If he shall vote upon his speech he will be voting against this bill because of something which is not within the bill at all. In the remarks which he submitted at the last session, as I now call them to mind, he said that there were short railroads in Massachusetts and in New England connected with long lines to the West, and that the effect of this bill would be to operate against the interests of those short roads.

Why, sir, how can that be? The bill does not treat of lines of road but of lines of commerce, whether composed of one or more railroads. And the rate being fixed, if it is $100 for a car-load from Chicago to Boston, under this bill a railroad company may charge $100 per car-load from Lowell to Boston. That, I think, is a full and complete answer to the objection made by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. SPARKS. If I understand the object of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] it is to prevent conflicts between railroads.

Mr. REAGAN. That will be one effect.

Mr. SPARKS. That being so, will it not to the same extent prevent competition between all roads?

Mr. REAGAN. I think the gentleman could not have noticed my remarks in relation to competition. I stated distinctly that there is nothing in the bill that can by any means affect competition between railroads, for the reason that we do not attempt to regulate the rates of freight at all; for the reason that we do not compare different lines of road, but leave every road free to adopt its own schedule of rates of freight.

Mr. EDEN. I ask the gentleman this question: If railroad companies cannot charge any more at non-competing points on their line than they charge at competing points, does not that prevent competition?

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman means to take the consequences of the view which his question implies, he will then be fair. If railroad companies undertake to carry through freights from one center of trade to another center of trade at less than compensating rates and then charge the way freights with the loss on the carriage of the through freight, we mean to defeat this; and if this is what he means by preventing competition, justice and right demand that to this extent it should be prevented. We do not mean by this bill to recognize the right to impose unjust and unequal burdens upon any one, whether at trade centers or at way stations. We mean, so far as the bill will enable us to do it, to compel those who ship upon railroads to pay their own freight at such just and reasonable rates as the interests of commerce and the interests of the road may justify and require.

Mr. EDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman one other question. Will not the effect of this bill be to prevent cities like Chicago and Saint Louis, for instance, from having the benefit of water competition?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not see how it can have that effect, because the roads can put their freights as low after this bill is passed as they can put them now. How, then, can the bill prevent the advantages of water communication? We do not prevent the railroad companies from putting their rates as low as they please.

Mr. EDEN. They will be compelled to take freight from points where there is no water communication at the same rate as from points with which there is water communication.

Mr. REAGAN. I can tell the gentleman where his view leads him. There is no way of escaping the justice of the position I have taken unless it be by insisting that all intermediate points—the way stations in town and city and country on the lines of railway—shall pay for the transportation of through freights. This is the issue sharply and clearly presented. Gentlemen have their choice to give us freights which are just and alike to all, or to vote against this bill and preserve the power of monopoly to levy exactions which have become almost unbearable upon this commerce, amounting to $18,000,000,000 annually, which now passes over our railroads.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If I understand the effect of the legislation here proposed it is this: if in any case, by reason of competition or otherwise, freight is carried from one State to another at less than the carrying is actually worth, then freights must necessarily be carried between all other points for less than the service is worth, whether there is competition or not.

Mr. REAGAN. Well, Mr. Speaker, we do not undertake to say that any road shall carry freight for less than it is worth to carry it; and this remark takes away the foundation of the question which the gentleman from Illinois has put. We do not propose to say that any railroad company shall carry freights for less than will compensate them; but we do propose to prevent the wrong of requiring two-thirds of the people of the country to pay the freights of the other third.

Mr. McMAHON. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. REAGAN. I will.

Mr. McMAHON. In the cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States as to the power of a State to regulate charges upon railroads, the decision, I believe, was put upon the ground that Congress had not acted upon this question. Suppose that Congress now acts upon the question by passing this bill, (and acts probably without full advice,) what will be the effect upon all the State laws so far as the railroads are under the control of such laws?

Mr. REAGAN. I had not expected to speak at this time on that subject; but as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] asks the question, I take pleasure in answering it at once. This bill provides for the regulation of interstate commerce, and has no relation to or effect upon State legislation with reference to State commerce—not the most remote.

Mr. McMAHON. We cannot avoid its having such an effect.

Mr. REAGAN. The States have no right to regulate interstate commerce.

Mr. McMAHON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The Supreme Court declared in the cases to which I have referred that the States had indirectly the right to affect interstate commerce, because they had the right to regulate the rates of charge within their own limits; that although interstate commerce was thus affected, yet until Congress should act upon the question the power was to this extent with these States.

Mr. REAGAN. I am aware that the Supreme Court said that State legislation might incidentally affect interstate commerce. But here we are proposing to pass a measure which defines interstate commerce, and limits its effect to such commerce wholly. We are proceeding under the Constitution, which authorizes the Congress of the United States to regulate commerce among the States, the Constitution interpreted, as I showed in my remarks when first presenting this bill to the House, by the elementary writers on the Constitution and as interpreted by the many decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States which I cited at that time. It would require more time than I now have to go over the constitutional argument; but if the gentleman will refer to my remarks at the last session he will see that in every phase in which this question has been raised the Supreme Court has held that the Congress of the United States is charged with the regulation of interstate commerce, and that the power is exclusive; that the States cannot regulate interstate commerce; that Congress cannot regulate the local commerce of a State.

These judicial decisions go further and declare that the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce is as full, as ample, as complete as the power of a State to regulate commerce within the territory of the State. If I have time, I will be glad to call attention to a number of elementary authorities and decisions of the Supreme Court on this subject.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas a question. What does he understand by the words "to regulate commerce between the States?" Does he understand that Congress can put a tariff upon articles which pass through a State; to fix the rate of transit through a sovereign State? What I understand by the regulation of commerce does not reach the question of direct taxation with regard to tariffs.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, there is something about the use of the words "sovereign States" which perhaps the gentleman does not consider. The State is sovereign as the constitutions of the United States and of the State make it so; that is, where its sovereignty is reserved it is sovereign, but here the sovereign power is delegated by the Constitution of the United States ratified by the States.

Why, then, in talking on this subject, do we talk of the sovereign rights of a State interfering with powers expressly delegated to the Congress of the United States, and held to be clearly and unquestionably delegated by all the courts of the country which have dealt with the question at all?

Mr. LATHROP. Will the gentleman allow me to ask one question in regard to the effect of the fourth section?

Mr. REAGAN. I will.

Mr. LATHROP. Under this fourth section would it not be impossible for a man to contract for the carriage of one hundred car-loads from Chicago to New York at any less than the company would take one car-load from Michigan City?

Mr. REAGAN. I think it has exactly that effect—that one monopoly shall not help the other to oppress the individual, but that a train of one hundred cars belonging to one hundred men shall be entitled to be carried at the same price as a train of one hundred cars belonging to one man.

Mr. LATHROP. Then, if I understand this bill in principle, it ignores the idea of wholesale dealing.

Mr. REAGAN. Not at all; we do not interfere with wholesale dealing; we simply demand common honesty in common carriers. In the ninth section the gentleman will see that it is provided that nothing in this act shall apply to the carriage, receiving, storage, handling, or forwarding of property less than an ordinary car-load, or wholly within one State or Territory, and not destined for carriage in another State or Territory, or going to or coming from some foreign country, or to property carried for the United States at lower rates of freight and charges than for the general public, or to the transportation of articles free or at reduced rates of freight for charitable purposes or to or from public fairs and expositions for exhibition.

When we create that unit we mean that unit shall be one of the instruments to secure justice alike between all shippers; we mean that one hundred men having one hundred separate car-loads put into the same train shall have their produce carried for the same price as one man could have one hundred car-loads carried.

And at this point I desire to say this very thing of allowing rebates and drawbacks to monopolies is abundantly illustrated in its enormous evils and effects by the oppression of the Cleveland Standard Oil Company entering into a combination with the New York Central, the Erie, the Pennsylvania Central, and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad so as to get its freight carried far below the rate allowed other producers of oil in the oil region, thereby compelling other companies and associations either to sell out to the Cleveland Standard Oil Company or to go down in bankruptcy.

Mr. POTTER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. REAGAN. I will in a moment; I am not through. The gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] discussed this subject during the last session, and with all his learning and ability, and with my great respect for him, I must confess my profound astonishment at some of the views he then expressed. Without turning to the speech of the gentleman, I think I remember particularly one point which I desire to call attention to, and that is where he stated his opposition to a law like this was not predicated on the belief the law itself was unjust, but upon the danger to the Congress of the United States entering upon the enactment of laws to regulate common carriers or interstate commerce. He predicts if we pass a just and wholesome law which in no way interferes with any necessary right or interest of a railroad company, but simply takes away the power of monopoly by which railroads abuse the powers secured by their charter, that when we do so we open up a field which will turn loose upon this Congress the combined influence of all the railroads in the country; and that instead of combining the influence of the railroads against the people and their representatives, he would rather permit them to outrage all right, to exercise unreasonable powers of monopoly and discriminate against individuals and communities. All this, according to that gentleman, we must acquiesce in or rather accept than enter upon the fearful duty of legislating in hostility simply to the power of monopoly.

Sir, has it at last come to this, that the representatives of the American people have not only reached the point that they dare not on this subject legislate for the interests of the people, but that they must, like cowards, shrink away from the discharge of the high duties demanded of us by the interests of the country and of the people from fear of arraying the powers of monopoly against the representatives of the people? Why, sir, if it has come to this, turn over your constitutional government to the great corporations; allow them to plunder and rob; allow them to build up and sustain monopoly; allow them to build up an oligarchy or an aristocracy, as they may choose; allow them to exercise all the discriminations, commit all the wrongs that they are committing under their powers, and say that the people of these United States are helpless, and that their representatives have sunk so far below that patriotism which has characterized them, and that courage which must always accompany the action of a man who discharges his duty in a great representative capacity, that we dare not check them.

Why, sir, in presence of these dangerous menaces is not now the time to assert the rights of the people through their representatives; to tell these gentlemen that while we pass no law that can abridge any reasonable right they possess, while we will do nothing that can put them to inconvenience, we will, in vindicating the rights, in supporting the rights, in protecting the rights of the people, insist on the passage of a law that shall take from them the power to charge A $100 for a car-load and B $50 for a car-load of freight, or to charge one town $50 for a car-load and another, perhaps nearer the market town or city, $100 for a car-load; that shall allow drawbacks and rebates; that shall allow pooling and combinations?

Sir, it has been urged that these railroads have their corporate authority from the States, and that therefore we cannot interfere with them. We are not dealing with the question of the corporate origin of a road, we are dealing with the commerce that passes over it; and if it be true that this Congress cannot execute the provision of the Constitution authorizing it to regulate commerce among the States, because it passes over roads built under acts of incorporation by the States, we have then nullified, or we have allowed a State to nullify, a provision of the Constitution by its acts and by indirection. Such a thing cannot be thought of, cannot be permitted.

The question presented by this bill is plainly a question of whether this Congress will rise to the dignity of the occasion by meeting the necessities of the country, by abridging wrong, by punishing wrong when it occurs, by protecting the people in the equal enjoyment of their rights. It lies at the very foundation of our system of government that exclusive privileges shall be granted to none, yet exclusive privileges are daily granted by these corporations, when this Congress could not do it, nor the General Government, nor any Legislature in the States.

While on the subject of the power of controlling these corporations let me remark I know that sometimes it is said that the Dartmouth College case is a precedent for preventing Congress from restraining and controlling corporations. The decision in the Dartmouth College case was good law for the case to which it applied, that of a private eleemosynary corporation, but is not law applying to a public or quasi-public corporation; and the effort to strain it into the service as applying to a public corporation is a disregard of all principles of law. It has from time immemorial, in Great Britain, the country from which we derive our system of laws, been held that common carriers were subject to regulation by acts of Parliament. It is held by the courts of that country, much more uniformly than by the courts of our country, that the fact that these corporations derive their franchises from the public, the fact that they are common carriers, the fact that their right to exact toll at all depends on the bounty of the Government in securing to them their charter, the fact that the public is interested in their transportation—that these facts give Parliament the absolute right to legislate in regulation of them without a reservation to that effect being contained in their charters. In our country, in our constitutional form of government, superadded to all these considerations is this: that we confer upon them, I suppose in all instances, the right of eminent domain, the right to condemn private property for their use upon just compensation. Now, as private property cannot be condemned for private use, as it can only be condemned for public use, each such corporation as accepts a charter authorizing the exercise by it of the right of eminent domain accepts the constitutional inference that its functions are public; otherwise it could not exercise the right of eminent domain; so that in our country, upon this principle of the Constitution, as the exercise of the right of a public corporation is for the public good, the fact that they are common carriers for hire, the fact that the whole public is interested in the commerce which they carry, gives to Congress the power as to interstate commerce to regulate the rates of freight.

And just here I may remark that the gentleman from New York and another gentleman said if you can go to the extent required by this bill of abridging the powers of monopolies, then you can go to the extent of saying that the railroad company shall carry freights for a certain stipulated price. That we might do so is within the purview of the Constitution as interpreted by the courts; but it is not in this bill.

I will ask gentlemen to limit their objections to the bill and its objects, and not to make objections to the bill on account of possibilities that do not arise upon it. It is time enough to vote against fixing schedule rates of freight when the proposition comes before Congress. We do not propose now any such thing. We are simply concerned in controlling the power of monopolies, in preventing unjust discriminations, in preventing rebates, in preventing the railroads from charging more for shorter than for longer distances upon a single line of transportation.

In addition to that we have provided in this bill ample provision for the execution of this law by the courts. Some objections have been urged to the provisions of the bill providing for its execution. Now, it is idle to enact a law unless we are so far in earnest, unless we so well comprehend the subject, that we are able to provide for executing the provisions of that law.

Unless some member feels an interest in the subject, I do not feel that I need undertake to discuss this provision of the bill, but will simply refer to the question of making everything a violation of the law that is done against its prohibition, and everything a violation of the law that is not done when commanded to be done, and fixing the penalties upon those who violate the law. I think this bill is framed so as to cover every possible chance of violation of the law.

This bill is intended to be a vigorous law, to be the assertion of the judgment of the American people upon a great question in a way that cannot be evaded and that cannot be avoided. This bill provides that the power of the people's representatives must be respected if it becomes necessary to compel respect through the courts of the country. To this end we have made ample provision in the bill to enforce all the points I have presented. Mr. Speaker, I would inquire how much time I have left?

The SPEAKER. There are five minutes of the hour remaining.

Mr. REAGAN. There is one thing I have alluded to to which I ought perhaps again to refer. This bill interests the people of every portion of the United States. It relates to a commerce which in 1870 was estimated by the gentleman who prepares the report upon internal commerce of the United States as amounting to more than $18,000,000,000. It relates to unjust discriminations and exactions made by those who control more than seventy-five thousand miles of railroad, more than $4,000,000,000 of railroad property. My hope is that the magnitude of these interests, the wonderful power that is brought to bear against the interests and rights of the people and the prosperity of the country, has not already grown too great for the people; that this Government has not already been dwarfed in power below corporations, but that the representatives of the people are still prepared to take care of their rights and are ready to assume such responsibilities as it may be necessary we should assume in order to protect the people against unjust exactions and the exercise by monopolies of powers injurious to the people. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.]

Mr. POTTER. I will use those three minutes first, to say that I protest against this method of legislation. I never would have given my consent to the introduction of this substitute had I known the manner in which it was to be considered by the House.

We debated a bill which involved one of the gravest constitutional questions which can possibly arise and which proposed to change the whole system of carriage throughout the country. We refused to advance that bill toward its passage, and then the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] asked unanimous leave to introduce a substitute, which leave was given without any knowledge that the position of the bill would cut off debate on the substitute. Then by virtue of the unanimous consent so given to him he comes in here and after having spoken an hour graciously allows to some of us three minutes to suggest our objections to this grave and important measure. Now, I do not think that the other gentlemen of this House more than myself understood what they were about when they gave consent to bring in such an amendment as this.

I wish next to protest against the declamation which assumes that gentlemen who oppose this bill do so in the interest of monopolies. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] talks about corporations and their dangers. I have insisted upon all that for years; I never gave a vote for the sake of favor to any corporation in my life. But this bill does not touch corporations as such; it touches persons. It is aimed not at railroad companies as companies but as carriers. Its very language is that "any person" engaged in such trade shall be subject to the provisions of this bill. The bill therefore proposes a regulation of trade, nothing else; and to say that because gentlemen do not favor such a bill as this they are therefore in favor or in the interest of monopolies is to say what is absolutely without warrant.

Those who do not favor this bill oppose it not because they favor monopolies, but because they do not believe in the regulations of trade which it proposes, and, beyond that, because they do not believe it safe for the Congress of the United States to enter upon the task of regulating the details of any business carried on by our citizens.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. This bill in the very beginning is aimed at corporations, because it says "lines of transportation."

Mr. POTTER. These are the words: "it shall be unlawful for any person or persons."

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Engaged in transportation.

Mr. POTTER. "Engaged alone or associated with others."

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Engaged in railroad associations!

University of Michigan

Mr. POTTER. "Engaged alone or associated with others in the transportation of property." Thus it would touch every railroad carrier and every carrier by canal or by turnpike in the land, whether a corporation or not.

Mr. REAGAN. The words "or otherwise" after "railroad" are stricken out by the amendment.

Mr. POTTER. Then, it is aimed at transportation by land alone. The bill, then, proposes a regulation of private business. Now, I say that no matter how badly a business is carried on or how unsound its principle, nothing can be more dangerous than for Congress to interfere with it. This interference itself is worse than any other evil; for if Congress has the power to regulate the manner in which a business is conducted by one part of its citizens it must have power to regulate business as conducted by any of them. Beginning, then, by regulating the tariff on railways, we may go to regulating the prices and profits of every citizen in his dealings with those outside of his State. Could anything be more unwise or more likely to end in abuse?

What is the object of this bill? To prevent discrimination in freights? Discrimination, how? Why discrimination in favor of customers at wholesale as against customers at retail. Now, assume that such discrimination is not sound or fair or wise. Is that any reason Congress should undertake to regulate it? There are abuses in every business. Take the hotels, for instance. Surely there are abuses enough in the management of hotels; but would we improve matters if we should undertake to conduct by the legislation of Congress the keeping of all the hotels in the country?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask unanimous consent that the time allowed for debate be extended thirty minutes.

There being no objection, the time was extended accordingly.

Mr. POTTER. I shall take, sir, but little of this time given by the House. I was saying that if Congress can interfere with one regulation of trade it can interfere with all. If it can put its hand in this way upon the business of any of its citizens, it can put its hand upon the undertakings of all of them. I am absolutely opposed myself to the creation of corporations by Congress, or to giving them any favors; but when they are created by the States to do a certain business, they have the same right to do it as other persons, except as restricted by their charters and the laws of the States creating them, and the danger of interfering with their methods of carrying on such lawful business is just the same as would be the danger of interfering with the traffic of other citizens.

The whole drift of this bill is that interstate carriers by railway shall not charge relatively more for way service than they charge for carrying freight between the extremities of the line. Why not? The gentleman from Texas says the effect of the present railway practice is to impose too high a tariff upon the intermediate localities along the line in order that between terminal points the carrier may be able to charge less. Now, why cannot this matter be safely left to the parties immediately concerned? What earthly danger is there except to the bondholders and shareholders of the railroads if these companies do carry goods between their termini at less than the cost of the service? Why should they not be permitted to do it? It is a matter which concerns them alone. I agree that as regards those interested in railroads this practice of carrying through freight for less than cost is unwise, but surely that is not an injury to the people of the country generally. It is unwise, if you please, unfair, for a man who makes shoes to sell them for less than cost wholesale; but why should Congress interfere to prevent that?

Look at our great foreign trade! How do we keep it up? How comes it that our vast surplus of grain is shipped abroad except that these crops are moved from where they are raised to the seaboard mainly without profit; sometimes for less than it costs to move them? Whom does this hurt? Surely not the country generally. It may hurt the people who own the railways, but it certainly does not hurt anybody else in the country. Yet it is proposed by this bill to prevent that, and to require the carriers to so reduce their local charges that they will be compelled to raise their through charges, and thus destroy this the only prosperous branch of foreign trade we have left. After having with tariffs and other interferences destroyed pretty much all the foreign trade; after having cut off free ships and cut off free goods, you now want to cut off free transportation.

Mr. THOMPSON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question pertinent to this matter. If the railroad companies, as the gentleman intimates, carry grain from the West to the seaboard at rates which are less than they can really afford, is it either just or proper that those who live farther east should make up for the loss which the railroads suffer in accommodating that great trade?

Mr. POTTER. It may not be just to the stockholders and the bondholders of the railways.

Mr. THOMPSON. Is it just to the people generally?

Mr. POTTER. Does the gentleman mean the body of the country?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. POTTER. Why not?

Mr. THOMPSON. In other words, then, if a railroad company loses on the grain which it transports from the great West it may justly make up the loss in the charges upon the Middle States for carrying the same products. And this is equity, this is justice!

Mr. POTTER. Why, in the first place, the railroad companies cannot carry anything except according to the tariffs fixed by the States creating them, and if they charge too much for service between local points the State can and will correct that. Then——

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. That is exactly what this bill proposes to break up. It proposes to take away from the States the right to control that matter, and to put it in the hands of Congress.

Mr. POTTER. If my colleague from the Rensselaer district [Mr. TOWNSEND] thinks that an advantage, I do not.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I say it is not an advantage. I say that this bill is conceived in folly.

Mr. POTTER. Then, Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me once in a while to be permitted to agree with my colleague.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. If you did so oftener you would get into fewer scrapes. [Laughter.]

Mr. POTTER. But I do not know that I should be so often right. [Laughter.]

Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] asked the gentleman from Texas a question not yet answered. He said that in the case of goods carried from Chicago to Buffalo there is a lake transportation competing with the transportation by rail, and the railway company to do this business must carry as low as the rates for water transportation; and he asked why a railway carrier should be required to carry freight to points along its line with which there is no competing water communication at rates as low as it charges for through freight carried to points to which there is water transportation. To this there can be no answer except that the fact does not exist. But the fact does exist. Take, for instance, the railway from Chicago to Buffalo. Its line passes, let us say, Laporte, to which there is no water transportation, yet that railway under this bill must carry freight from Chicago to Laporte at water rates or else it cannot compete with lake transportation between Chicago and Buffalo at all.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from New York will allow me to suggest that railroads under this bill may carry as cheaply as they please; there is nothing to prevent that.

Mr. POTTER. They may carry as cheaply as they please; yes, but the theory of cutting down the local rates until you get them as low as the through rates must result in bringing up the through rates. If one end of the beam goes down the other end of the beam must go up. The result of this equipoise must be that the carriers will have to do business as it is not naturally done, and just as the persons who engage in it find it is not practicable to do it, and in a way which I think will in the end prove to be not for the interest of the country.

Mr. REAGAN. Let me say a word here. Suppose freights are to be carried where there is competition, from Chicago to Buffalo, still the freights go by land from Buffalo to New York or by canal or in some other way than by the lakes, and these shippers of freight going through New York may be charged as much on freights from Chicago to Buffalo as from Chicago to New York. Now, then, if they may do that, can they not go as well as by water transportation, considering the water transportation has to be supplemented by land carriage over a portion of the road?

Mr. POTTER. I do not myself understand the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas. But it is not necessary to refine about it. The principal effect of this bill, as he tells us, is to forbid people doing business at points between termini at any higher rate than between the termini. That, after all, is to declare that a carrier shall not do much business any cheaper than he does little business. It is to say he shall not conduct wholesale trade at less rate than retail trade. If Congress may do that about a railroad, Congress may do it about the business of a grocer, or a dealer in cotton goods, or anybody else engaged in interstate commerce. A man who sells goods to go outside of his State cannot, according to the principle of this bill, sell at any less price one thousand cases of goods than he sells one case. There may be sometimes a man here and there hurt for want of such regulations of trade, but there can be no gain to the country as a whole by Congress undertaking to correct such evils, if they be evils. This bill is a novelty; it is an innovation; it is introduced under the pretense of justice to localities, and is said to be called for by existing conditions of trade. If it goes into effect it will result, as all these things do, in these great carriers controlling Congress and determining its action about freights themselves. Whatever evils there are in the discrimination which the great carriers make in favor of through over local freights, I believe the local dealers had better be left to the protection of the State Legislatures and the laws of trade and competition than to secure relief by the legislation of Congress.

Once let it be understood by these great railway barons that Congress can put down rates, and they will take care to see that it puts them up as well when they want that. They are the most powerful interest in the country. They have long desired action by Congress that would enable them to claim its protection against the States. Once have it understood Congress can control them, and it will turn out that Congress will be used to protect them.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I believe, Mr. Speaker, I am entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is bound to recognize the gentleman from Kansas, as it was upon his motion the time for debate was extended.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman from New York has not yet concluded his speech, and he yields to me for a question.

The SPEAKER. Of course, that being the case, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I understood the gentleman from New York to say that the gentleman from Texas presents this bill as solely intended to prevent discrimination against parties between competing points.

Mr. POTTER. Between terminal points.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Between terminal points. I do not so understand the bill, and therefore wish information from the gentleman from New York. One provision of the bill prohibits "pooling." I wish to state a fact and obtain information in regard to this point. About the 1st of August last the rate of transportation for wheat from Saint Louis to New York was somewhere between eighteen and nineteen cents a bushel. About that period wheat advanced on the market eight or nine cents. Tom Scott and the controller of the New York Central Railroad, the controller of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and controller of the Erie Railroad came together and advanced the rate of transportation for wheat from Saint Louis to New York eight or nine cents per bushel. What was the result? The farmers who anticipated higher prices for their wheat product were disappointed by the men who had formed this combination.

This bill by its express terms prohibits any such "pooling" arrangement hereafter. It does not do away with but fosters competition between these lines and prevents "pooling." Therefore I maintain it is as much in the interest of competition between terminal points as for the protection of parties at intermediate points. I shall vote for the bill because from a study of its features I have come to the conclusion that every man who raises a bushel of wheat, every man who raises a bushel of corn, every man who ships a pound of freight from or to the West, needs that the strong hand of the National Government shall be stretched forth to protect him from railroad monopolies, and prevent them from levying an onerous and unjust tax upon all producers as well as consumers. I now desire an answer to my question, does not this bill protect shippers at terminal as well as at intermediate points?

Mr. POTTER. The gentleman from Illinois has asked me a question which he did not expect me to answer.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Oh, yes, I did.

Mr. POTTER. For the gentleman took all the time answering the question himself. I will therefore merely say that this business of going into Congress every time a man finds something in the trade of the country injurious to his particular interest and asking Congress to interfere is the remedy beyond all others, in my judgment, which cannot in the end work anything but universal disaster. We have got too much congressional legislation in the United States now, and the more we enlarge the scope of it the worse off in the long run we shall be.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I shall only occupy a small portion of the time and shall cheerfully yield the remainder of it to other gentlemen who wish to speak.

I fully sympathize with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] in what he has said in regard to corporations, and companies, and railroads, as to restraining them. I hold that these are the creatures of law and should be subject to its just restrictions. But the gentleman in his measure has incorporated more. It is not merely a measure to restrain railroads from some of their questionable practices, and I think it touches these subjects in a very insufficient way, but it is a piece of legislation to advance certain interests at the expense of other interests. His bill proposes to interfere directly with the legitimate action of trade, and is a blow aimed at wholesale transactions in shipping, and the localties dependent on wholesale transactions in shipping. I will give an illustration, as a practical illustration is worth any quantity of theory.

From Kansas City, in the State of Missouri, at the mouth of the Kansas River, some three hundred or four hundred car-loads of wheat or stock are shipped every day. These cars go in a continuous run to the eastern sea-board. They are carried at very low rates. The cars go together and are returned, many of them in freight, and the company can afford to carry them at 50 per cent. less than on the shorter lines. I say that if you take away this privilege which exists in the natural order of business, the privilege of shipping beef, cattle, pork, and wheat in great bulk, by a hundred car-loads at a time from these points in the West to the eastern market, you prevent that trade from being carried on; you render it impossible. The present rates, low as they are, are so high that the producer of wheat cannot get a remunerative price for it, and if you raise the rates by this bill you virtually take away the market and put an end to a great trade. I will state, for instance, that down a line which runs from my own State to Galveston, wheat was carried at $100 a car-load of four hundred and thirty bushels, and from Galveston, at six cents, to New York. That line furnished a better market, but under this bill that line, just opening, would be virtually closed. By taking this course you would prevent one bushel of grain from going from the western producer to the eastern sea-board. You virtually shut the market to him. I should rather see steps taken to reduce than to increase the price of transportation.

I will say to my friend from Texas that I would have been glad if he had consented to have this section of his bill stricken out. There are sections of it for which I would cheerfully have voted; for while the phraseology of the bill is obscure and would probably destroy its usefulness, this section is not just in its provisions. It takes away a business advantage from one section that has accrued in a legitimate way. A man may ship a car-load from Pittsburgh or from Cincinnati, and that single car sent to New York may take weeks before it comes back to the railroad company which supplies it. It may have to be taken back all the way empty, and they cannot afford to take it at the same rate as one hundred cars which proceed without loss of time to New York and return carrying freight to the West. The gentleman from Texas knows very well it is the fact. It is a law which governs the whole course of our trade. That will be the effect of the fourth section of this bill in its present shape. I have none of the constitutional fears of my friend from New York. I think these through lines passing through the various States are under the control of this Congress or its legislation under the clause of the Constitution the gentleman from Texas has quoted. I shall never hesitate to exercise that power when a measure presents itself that is commended to my judgment, but this measure contains within it a dangerous proposition, a proposition directly interfering with legitimate business, and a proposition which ought not to receive the sanction of this House, and which I ask members carefully to examine as they vote for it.

Mr. REAGAN. Before the gentleman from Kansas takes his seat, I desire to ask him whether there is anything in the fourth section which prohibits railroad companies from returning cars at as low rates as may be agreed upon?

Mr. PHILLIPS. There is in this section a provision which prevents them from charging less for a single car to Pittsburgh than for one hundred cars to Kansas City, provided the company thought it could afford to do so.

I yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I regret that this bill occupies the parliamentary position that it does. It is not subject to amendment. We cannot do otherwise than vote "ay" or "no" upon the whole bill. I desire to say that I believe in the power, and that it is the duty of Congress to make all necessary regulations touching commerce among the States, and will vote for all well-conceived legislation that commends itself to my judgment to that end. But I doubt whether this bill will accomplish what is desirable to any considerable number of people in the country. That part of the substitute, especially section 3, which prohibits, or is intended to prohibit, pooling, I believe is a good measure; indeed, I had the honor originally to move an amendment to the bill which prohibited the pooling of earnings, which was adopted by the House, and I would vote for it with great pleasure if I could vote for it separately from some other provisions. But the fourth section of the substitute, which provides that you shall not charge more for a shorter than for a longer haul, I am not willing to vote for, because, as stated by a number of gentlemen, it tends to interfere with competition and with the ordinary course of trade.

Now, my friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] says that there have been some pooling arrangements lately which operate badly. Why was it necessary for these parties to enter into pooling arrangements? For the very reason, I apprehend, that under ordinary competition between great railway routes and water routes, these roads for the purpose of doing business upon these long hauls from the great graneries of the West to the seaboard, carried the grain for fully as low rates as they could afford, if not in some instances for lower rates. And they undertook by pooling to cut off competition. Therefore, I would prohibit by enactment all such pooling agreements.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I understand there is no really practical water line of transportation from Saint Louis to New York; we are compelled to patronize railroads.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. There is a water line from Saint Louis to the Gulf.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It is said you cannot ship wheat by way of the Gulf for the reason that it is liable to mould.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Wheat is only one of the articles to be shipped, and as for that matter there is a great deal of wheat shipped by way of New Orleans. The operation of this bill would be by law to keep up in effect a continual pool, as it would prevent competition.

Mr. COLE. May I interrupt the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] in order to reply to his colleague, [Mr. TOWNSHEND,] who has stated in effect that the river and Gulf routes from Saint Louis to the East, via the Gulf, is not a competing route to the railway transportation companies, from the fact that grain is liable to mould by that route. By stating that, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is in error, as the millions of bushels of wheat, corn, and other cereals now passing through the mouth of the Mississippi from the great West abundantly testify.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Wheat is shipped by that way to Europe, not to New York.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I understand that this bill practically by law takes away the necessity for pooling, because it practically takes away the competition between the routes from Illinois and the great West to the seaboard. Now, I for one would keep up the competition, and then I would legislate against any combinations that interfered with competition. I would therefore prohibit pooling by law. But I would not cut it off by enacting legislation that would be worse in its effect than the pooling. I would not cut it off by legislation which would destroy the very competition that the gentleman is himself interested in. I feel an interest in this matter because, in common with other people, especially of the West, my constituents for years have been burdening themselves with debt and taxation to aid in the construction of competing lines of transportation to the lakes and the seaboard; and while we are staggering under this load of debt which we have incurred in aid of competition I am not willing to see any legislation that would rob us of the full benefit of the outlays which we have made. I would vote for a well-conceived bill providing an ample and more speedy remedy for extortion practiced by those who are engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] in his remarks quoted a resolution of the Legislature of New York requesting, as I understood him to say, the Senators and Representatives from that State to support the bill under consideration. On my questioning him, however, he read the resolution, which proved to be a request to us to support a "wise" measure for the regulation of interstate transportation.

Now this bill is not a wise measure. If we were at liberty to offer amendments to it, undoubtedly it could readily be placed in such a form as would command the support of the Senators and Representatives from the State of New York. But no such opportunity is offered to us. For example, the first section of this substitute lays down a principle to which every man familiar with trade can readily subscribe. But when it goes further and provides that it shall be unlawful under any circumstances to make rebates, it is simply equivalent to saying that certain classes of business of the greatest moment to the people of this country shall no longer be carried on.

For example, take the grain trade, the great business of the West. Over $300,000,000 of the products of the West have been sent to Europe during the last fiscal year. Now, the price of grain is not fixed in Chicago or at Saint Louis, but in Mark Lane, in London. And it is made there in competition with the grain of Russia, of Algiers, of Italy, and even of far off India. In order that we may sell our grain in that market we must accept their prices. And the sum which is received by the producer of the grain in this country is the price paid in Mark Lane, less the cost of transportation from his farm to the Liverpool market.

Now, the railroad companies are interested in having continued employment for their rolling-stock, and when they find it necessary to put down rates in order to keep the foreign market, they do it, and they act as a salutary regulator in opening and keeping open the market to American trade and commerce, which otherwise would be closed to them.

I was surprised to hear the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] quote the action of the four great railroad companies as being precluded by the terms of this bill. On his own statement what they agreed to do was simply to raise the price of transportation just as on previous occasions they had reduced the price of transportation in order to keep the foreign market.

Now, the provisions of this bill will absolutely prevent the railroad companies from taking this course hereafter, and the inevitable result will be that every particle of local transportation will be done at a higher cost than it is now, for I affirm—and every gentleman in this House having any connection with railroads will confirm what I say—that it is possible to do the local transportation upon better terms by reason of having the through transportation to supplement the trade than it would be if there were no through transportation, so that the low charges made for the transportation of grain which is to be shipped abroad not only give a higher price to the producer of that grain, but enable the railroad companies to do business for the people along the line at lower rates than they would otherwise be able to do it.

The cheapness with which transportation can be done depends upon the volume of the business and its uninterrupted flow. The more steadily the rolling-stock is employed the less the cost per ton on the freight moved. The only thing that enables our grain to be sold in the European market in competition with rival nations is that the steamships are promptly loaded with full cargoes, for steamers, like cars and locomotives, must be kept running in order to admit of cheap freights. The provisions of this bill would absolutely prohibit any rebate of freights, or any change in them under five days' notice, during which time the rolling-stock and the steamer must lie idle, and in the mean time, if the price should change, as it does almost hourly, the shipment might and often would be altogether prevented, and the sale of our products be altogether prevented. The effect of such legislation must therefore be to reduce the volume of business, to increase the cost of transportation, and to the extent of such increase reduce the net results remaining for the western producer. It would also destroy the commerce of the eastern seaports, and the existing depression in business so magnified that any recovery might well be regarded as hopeless. I cannot conceive of a measure more fraught with mischief to every class in the community, and its passage will be a crowning act of folly—in fact, an attempt to commit commercial suicide. The State of New York does not desire its Representatives to vote for any such destructive measures.

I repeat, therefore, that this bill does not contain the true remedy; but there is a remedy—a wiser and more efficient one—which was pointed out to the gentleman from Texas by the resolution of the New York Board of Trade, which he quoted in his speech at the last session. That resolution proposed that a commission of competent experts should be created by Congress to supervise interstate commerce. Just as a similar commission in Massachusetts, without power to change rates or to do anything else than to inquire into and point out abuses, has reformed the railroad system of that State, so a congressional commission appointed to overlook interstate commerce, point out abuses, and call public attention at once to any violation of the laws of trade, would very soon cure all these abuses, which I admit are very grievous and which do demand careful attention from Congress and from all who are interested in developing this great foreign trade which at length is pulling us out of the quagmire into which we have been plunged by bad financial legislation and by an extravagant government.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question before he takes his seat. I stated that the combination entered into by four great railroads on the 4th of last August was a pooling operation. Now, the fact is, that during the winter, when transportation on the lakes is stopped, every bushel of wheat coming from Illinois does reach the New York market by one of these four lines of railroad. Not one pound of freight does pass from the West to the East without paying tribute to one of these corporations. The managers of these four railroad companies, having complete mastery of the commerce of the West, come together and form a pool, so arranging that not one single bushel of grain shall be transported from the West to the East at less than a particular figure. Now, is not that a pooling operation?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If the Speaker will allow me, I will answer the gentleman's question. His definition of the word "pool" does not correspond with that of the dictionary. These roads did combine to fix a rate, but they did not combine to pool their earnings.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I understand the proper definition, and I say that, according to the newspapers, they did in that instance combine to pool their earnings as well as fix the rate.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate has expired. The main question having been ordered, the question is first upon the amendment in the nature of a substitute, as offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. McKENZIE called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 139, nays 104, not voting 48; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. BLAND. I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. BANKS. If he were present, I should vote "ay."

Mr. BELL. My colleague, Mr. STEPHENS, is still detained at his room by sickness.

Mr. STEWART. I am paired on political questions with the gentleman from Florida, Mr. DAVIDSON; but not regarding this as a political question I vote "no."

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. REAGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced concurrence in resolution of the House that the Congress of the United States will take part in the services to be observed on Thursday evening, January 16, 1879, in honor of the memory of Joseph Henry, late secretary Smithsonian Institution.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. KNOTT. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4553) to provide for the further distribution of the moneys received under the Geneva award.

Mr. KNOTT. I call for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all persons and corporations claiming to be entitled to any portions of the moneys now under the control of the United States which were received from the government of Great Britain in payment of the Geneva award, or as interest thereon, be, and they are hereby, authorized to sue for the same in the United States Court of Claims at any time within one year from the passage of this act, in the same manner in which other claims are sued in said court; and the said court shall render judgment for each claimant who was an actual sufferer by the violation of the laws of neutrality by Great Britain for such amount only as, in their opinion, he shall be justly entitled to recover under said treaty and award according to the principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations, without regard to any rule or principle of allowance, exclusion, inclusion, or distribution heretofore adopted by Congress, in chapter 459 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress, or otherwise, or by the tribunal created by said law; but all payments heretofore made on any claim by the United States shall be deducted from the judgment to be rendered thereon.

SEC. 2. That in determining the amount for which judgment is to be rendered in favor of any claimant, interest shall be allowed at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum upon the amount of such claim from the date when the court shall in each case decide that the loss out of which the claim arose was sustained by the claimant; but in entering the judgment the amount of principal and interest shall be stated separately.

SEC. 3. That such persons and corporations of the United States may respectively appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from judgments of the Court of Claims rendered under this act, and such appeals shall be in the form now prescribed by law.

SEC. 4. That all judgments in favor of claimants under this act not appealed from or affirmed on appeal shall be paid out of the aforesaid moneys. Every person or corporation who shall sue under this act shall, within one year from the passage thereof, file with the clerk of the Court of Claims a copy, under oath, of his or their claim; and, at the expiration of the said year, the clerk of said court shall ascertain the total amount of the money and the interest thereon, then under the control of the United States, received from Great Britain in payment of the Geneva award; and thereafter each claimant, at the expiration of ten days after a judgment shall be perfected in his favor, (provided no appeal is taken; and if an appeal is taken, at the expiration of ten days after final judgment in his favor,) shall be entitled to be paid out of the aforesaid moneys the ratable proportion thereof to which he would be entitled if the entire claims so filed were allowed. The remainder of each judgment shall be paid at the expiration of three years from the passage of this act, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the recovery of such judgments; but if the sum of the judgments be greater than the moneys aforesaid, then the remainder of such judgments shall be paid ratably.

SEC. 5. That if necessary for the dispatch of business under this act, the clerk of the Court of Claims may appoint one or more assistants, and their salaries and all other expenses under this act shall be paid out of the said moneys.

SEC. 6. That no claim which was provable under the acts organizing and continuing the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, and was there duly presented, and was there adjudged, shall be provable under this act.

SEC. 7. That claimants under this act shall be admitted to testify in their own behalf.

SEC. 8. That appeals arising under this act shall take precedence of all other cases in the Supreme Court.

SEC. 9. That after the payment of all judgments rendered in pursuance of this act, if there shall remain any part of the said money, the same shall be and remain a special fund, to await the further action of Congress.

Mr. FRYE's amendment is as follows:

Add to first section:

But in no case shall any claim be admitted or allowed by said court by or in behalf of any insurance company or insurer, either in its or his own right, or as assignee or otherwise in the right of a person or party insured as aforesaid, unless such claimant shall show to the satisfaction of the court that during the late rebellion the sum of its or his losses in respect to its or his war risks exceeded the sum of its or his premiums or other gains upon or in respect to such war risks; and in case of any such allowance, the same shall not be greater than such excess of loss. And no claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court arising in favor of any insurance company not lawfully existing, at the time of the loss, under the laws of some one of the United States.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I ask for the reading of the report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire the reading of the majority and minority reports?

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I do; both.

The Clerk proceeded to read the reports, when, on motion of Mr. HARTRIDGE, by unanimous consent, the bill and Mr. FRYE's amendment, together with the majority and minority reports, and the substitute proposed by the minority, were ordered to be printed in the RECORD. The reports and substitute are as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred sundry bills in relation to the distribution of the unappropriated moneys paid to the United States by Great Britain in pursuance of the award made by the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report the accompanying bill with the recommendation that it be passed, and would respectfully submit the following views in connection therewith:

It is, of course, impossible to arrive at any just conclusion as to what disposition should be made of the unexpended balance of the fund derived from the arbitrament at Geneva without some understanding of the origin and nature of the claims for which it was awarded, as well as of the facts which led to the organization, and pertain to the transactions of the tribunal by which the award was made. It is unnecessary, however, to swell the volume of this paper with a minute history of the operations of the several confederate cruisers during the late civil war, or by numerous quotations from the voluminous correspondence between the representatives of our own and the British government, with regard to "what are generally known as the Alabama claims," in order to present the lights in which those claims were regarded by each at the time the circumstances which gave rise to them occurred. It is, perhaps, sufficient to state here the general facts familiar to all, that in consequence of the appearance upon the high seas of the Alabama, and other confederate cruisers, fitted out and sailed from British waters, a large portion of the American commercial marine was speedily transferred to the British flag, while such of our ship-owners and merchants who either preferred or were compelled by circumstances to keep their vessels and cargoes under the flag of their own country were subjected to the payment of greatly enhanced rates of insurance, where they chose to, or could, insure at all. In the mean while the pursuit of these cruisers necessarily compelled the expenditure of large sums of money by the Government of the United States, thereby adding very largely to the cost, while their very presence upon the seas manifestly tended to prolong the war.

In addition to this, these cruisers, as is well known, destroyed a large number of vessels, with their cargoes, belonging to American citizens, who claimed that their losses resulted from the failure of the British government to properly discharge its duties as a neutral, by negligently permitting the cruisers to be fitted out, supplied, and sailed from British ports, and that consequently Great Britain was liable for the damages they had sustained. In the absence of all other remedy many of them sought the interposition of their government for redress, and their claims were promptly presented to the government of Great Britain for satisfaction as soon as practicable after they accrued.

Upon the presentation of each of these claims, however, whether preferred in behalf of the owner of the ship or cargo or of the insurer who had paid the loss and claimed to be subrogated to the rights of the insured, the British government at once and emphatically denied all responsibility, and after the close of the war a list of them was prepared and printed in the Department of State under the following heading, which clearly indicates their character:

"List of claims for property destroyed by rebel cruisers fitted out in British ports.—The following is an abstract of the claims filed in the Department of State by American citizens, native and naturalized, for damages sustained by them as owners, mariners, freighters, or insurers of duly documented American ships captured and destroyed, or appropriated by the officers and crew of the steamer Alabama, and as owners, insurers, or otherwise interested in the cargoes of such ships, or in charter parties for the service of said ships. The several insurance companies are corporations organized and doing business under the laws of the several States in which they are respectively located."

Similar headings were affixed to the lists of losses occasioned by the Florida, Georgia, and Shenandoah. (See Appendix United States Claims, volume 4, pages 422 and 444.)

Copies of these lists were transmitted by the Secretary of State to our minister at the Court of St. James, on the 27th of August, 1866, with instructions to him to call the attention of Lord Stanley to the claims with a view to their settlement. (United States Claims, volume 3, page 632.) The instructions of the Secretary of State and the accompanying lists of claims were at once presented by our minister, Mr. Adams, to Lord Stanley, which led to the lengthy negotiations which resulted in the Johnson Stanley convention of November 10, 1868, (United States Claims, volume 3, page 701,) and the Johnson-Clarendon convention of January 14, 1869. (Ib., 732.) neither of which proved satisfactory to the United States, and finally in what is known as the treaty of Washington, concluded May 8, 1871.

In the mean time, however, the President of the United States, in his annual message, December 5, 1870, after having expressed his regret that no conclusion had been reached for the adjustment of these claims, recommended to Congress "to authorize the appointment of a commission to take proof of the amounts and ownership of these several claims on notice to the representatives of Her Majesty at Washington, and that authority be given for the settlement of these claims by the United States, so that the Government shall have the ownership of the private claims as well as the responsible control of all the demands against Great Britain." (See House Journal, third session, Forty-first Congress, page 13.)

The points in the treaty of Washington above alluded to material to the matter under consideration are as follows:

1. In the first article the two powers agreed that claims growing out of acts committed by said vessels, and generically known as the "Alabama claims," should be referred to a tribunal of arbitration, to be composed of five arbitrators, to be appointed in the manner therein prescribed, who, according to the terms of the next succeeding article, were to meet at Geneva, Switzerland, at the earliest convenient day after their appointment, and proceed impartially and carefully to examine and decide all questions laid before them by the two governments.

2. By the third article each party was required to lay before the tribunal its written or printed case, accompanied by the documents, official correspondence, and other evidence upon which the party filing it might rely, within six months from the date of the exchange of ratifications of the treaty.

3. In the sixth article three rules were laid down, which, together with such principles of international law not inconsistent therewith as the arbitrators should consider applicable to the case, were to govern them in their adjudication of the matters submitted to their arbitrament.

4. By the seventh article the tribunal was directed to determine as to each vessel (1) whether Great Britain had, by any act or omission, failed to fulfill any duty set forth in the "three rules" or recognized by the principles of international law not inconsistent therewith, and to certify such fact as to each vessel; and (2) in case it should find that Great Britain had failed to fulfill any of said duties, it might, if it should think proper, proceed to award a sum in gross, to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for all claims referred to it.

5. And in article 10 it was agreed that, should the tribunal find that Great Britain had failed to fulfill any of said duties, and should also fail to award a sum in gross, a board of assessors should be appointed to ascertain and determine what claims were valid, and what sums should be paid by Great Britain to the United States on account of the liability arising from the failure as to each vessel according to the extent of such liability as decided by the arbitrators.

The tribunal of arbitration contemplated in this treaty met and organized at the place agreed upon, and the United States, within the time specified, presented their case, exhibiting a detailed statement of all the claims which had come to the knowledge of the Government, showing the cruiser which did the injury, the vessels destroyed, the several claimants of the vessels and cargoes, the amount of insurance on each, and all the other facts necessary to enable the tribunal to reach a conclusion as to the amount of injury committed by each cruiser, and who were the sufferers thereby. Besides these claims for direct losses, the United States also presented claims for indirect losses resulting from the operations of the confederate cruisers, including the transfer of a large part of the American commercial marine to the British flag, the enhanced rates of insurance, popularly known as "war premiums," and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war.

The claims set up by the United States on account of indirect losses met with such a decided opposition on the part of Great Britain as threatened to defeat any settlement of the differences between the two countries if such claims should continue to be insisted upon. This led to negotiations for an additional article to the treaty which would remove the indirect claims from the consideration of the tribunal; but the two powers being unable to agree upon its terms the matter was left undetermined until the day arrived upon which the parties were to file their arguments. The United States did so, but the agent of the British government withheld that of Great Britain, and asked an adjournment in order that the two governments might come to some understanding with regard to the indirect claims.

Four days thereafter the tribunal of arbitration announced that "after the most careful perusal of all that had been urged on the part of the United States in respect to these claims, they had arrived, individually and collectively, at the conclusion that these claims did not constitute, upon principles of international law applicable to such cases, good foundation for an award of compensation or computation of damages between nations, and should, upon such principles, be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal in making its award, even if there was no disagreement between the two governments as to the competency of the tribunal to decide thereon." (Correspondence respecting Geneva arbitration, page 152.)

The counsel of the United States at once advised Mr. Davis, the agent, that this statement of the tribunal must be accepted by the United States as determinative of its judgment upon the question of public law involved, and that the United States should announce to the tribunal that the claims covered by its opinion would not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, and might be excluded from all consideration by the tribunal in making its award. (Ibid.) Mr. Davis immediately telegraphed to Mr. Fish not only a copy of the opinion at which the tribunal had arrived but a statement of the advice he had received from the counsel of the United States thereon, to which Mr. Fish replied instructing him "that in accordance with such judgment and opinion, from henceforth he [the President] regards the claims set forth in the case presented on the part of the United States for loss in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag, the enhanced payment of insurance, and the prolongation of the war and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion as adjudicated and disposed of; and that consequently they will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, but are henceforth excluded from its consideration by the tribunal in making its award." (Correspondence, 152.

On receipt of this instruction the agent of the United States made to the tribunal the following statement:

"The declaration made by the tribunal, individually and collectively, respecting the claims presented by the United States for the award of the tribunal for, first, the losses in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag; second, the enhanced payments of insurance; and, third, the prolongation of the war and the suppression of the rebellion is accepted by the President of the United States as determinative of their judgment upon the important questions of public law involved. The agent of the United States is authorized to say that, consequently, the above-mentioned claims will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, and may be excluded from all consideration in any award that may be made." (Protocol vi, page 21, volume 4, Geneva Arbitration.)

Two days thereafter Lord Tenterden, the agent of Great Britain, filed with the tribunal a paper signifying the acquiescence of his government in the views of the tribunal embraced in the declaration above recited; and Count Sclopis, the president of the tribunal, "on behalf of all the arbitrators, then declared that said several claims for indirect losses mentioned in the statement made by the agent of the United States on the 25th instant, and referred to in the statement just made by the agent of Her Britannic Majesty, are, and from henceforth shall be, wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal, and directed the secretary to embody this declaration in the protocol of this day's proceedings." (Protocol vii, page 22, volume 4.)

This difficulty, which had seemed to seriously threaten the further continuance of the arbitration, having been thus removed, the tribunal, as directed by the seventh article of the treaty, proceeded to inquire as to what particular cruisers for the depredations of which Great Britain should be held responsible under the three rules laid down in article 6, and the principles of public law not inconsistent therewith, on account of her alleged negligence, taking up and considering the case as to each of the following-named vessels separately, viz: the Florida, the Alabama, the Georgia, the Sumter, the Nashville, the Chickamauga, the Tallahassee, the Retribution, the Tuscaloosa, and the Shenandoah, and upon the question whether Great Britain had by any act or omission failed to fulfill any of the duties set forth in the three rules mentioned in article 6 of the treaty or recognized by the principles of international law not inconsistent therewith, as to each of the following vessels, the Sumter, the Nashville, the Georgia, the Tallahassee, and the Chickamauga, the tribunal unanimously answered "No." Upon the like question as to the Retribution, one of the arbitrators, Mr. Adams, answered "Yes, as to all the acts of this vessel," and another, Mr. Staempfli, answered "Yes, as to the loss of the Emily Fisher," the other three answering "No." Upon the same question as to the Alabama the tribunal unanimously answered "Yes," while as to the Florida four of the arbitrators answered "Yes," and one, Sir Alexander Cockburn, answered "No;" and as to the Shenandoah three of the arbitrators, Mr. Adams, Mr. Staempfli, and Count Sclopis answered "Yes," but only for the acts committed by this vessel after her departure from Melbourne on the 18th of February, 1865; the other two voted "No."

As a question of principle the tribunal then unanimously declared that Great Britain should be considered as responsible for the tenders in the same degree as for the vessels to which they were attached; and, upon the question as to the Tuscaloosa, a tender of the Alabama, the tribunal unanimously answered "Yes." The same question being taken separately upon the Taconey, the Clarence, and the Archer, tenders to the Florida, four of the arbitrators answered "Yes," and one, Sir Alexander Cockburn, answered "No." (See Protocols xxv and xxvi.)

Having thus determined that Great Britain was only responsible for the consequences of the acts of the Alabama, the Florida, and their tenders, and of the Shenandoah after she left the port of Melbourne, and having already determined that claims for indirect losses resulting from the transfer of our commercial marine to the British flag, enhanced rates of insurance, or the prolongation and increased cost of the war could not be considered by them, and such claims having been excluded from their consideration with the assent of both governments, as already seen, when the tribunal came to the discharge of their next duty under the treaty, namely, to ascertain the extent to which Great Britain was liable, the only remaining basis upon which that liability could be estimated was the "direct claims," which embraced two classes: First, claims for direct losses growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes by the three vessels above named and their tenders; and, second, the expenses incurred by the United States in pursuit of those cruisers.

As to the second class of these direct claims, the judgment of the tribunal was as follows:

"Whereas, so far as relates to the particulars of the indemnity claimed by the United States, the costs of pursuit of the confederate cruisers are not, in the judgment of the tribunal, properly distinguishable from the general expenses of the war carried on by the United States, the tribunal is therefore of opinion, by a majority of three voices to two, that there is no ground for awarding to the United States any sum by way of indemnity under this head." (See Decision and Award, volume 4, page 53.)

This narrowed the basis down to the first class of "direct losses," namely, those resulting directly from the destruction of vessels and their cargoes by the three inculpated cruisers and their tenders, from which the tribunal eliminated the element of "prospective earnings" by the following decision:

"And whereas prospective earnings cannot properly be made the subject of compensation, inasmuch as they depend in their nature upon future and uncertain contingencies, the tribunal is unanimously of opinion that there is no ground for awarding to the United States any sum by way of indemnity under this head." (Ib., 453.)

Having thus determined that the extent of the indemnity claimed by the United States should be limited to losses resulting directly from the destruction of vessels and their cargoes by the three inculpated cruisers and their tenders, it only remained for the tribunal to ascertain and award to the United States a sum in gross sufficient to cover these losses, as it was authorized to do by the seventh article of the treaty, or to remit the duty of auditing each claim properly within the purview of the award to a board of assessors, as provided in article 10. It is proper to remark in this connection that Mr. Fish, in a letter to Mr. Cushing, one of the counsel of the United States, under date December 8, 1871, used the following language, indicating the preference of the President of the United States in that regard:

"The President desires to have the subject discussed as one between the two governments; and he directs me to urge upon you strongly to secure, if possible, the award of a sum in gross. In the discussion of this question, and in the treatment of the entire case, you will be careful not to commit the Government as to the disposition of what may be awarded, or what may be recovered in the event of the appointment of the board of assessors, mentioned in the tenth article of the treaty. It is possible that there may be duplicate claims for some of the property alleged to have been captured and destroyed, as in the cases of insurers and insured. The Government wishes to hold itself free to decide as to the rights and claims of insurers upon the termination of the case. If the value of the property captured or destroyed be recovered in the name of the Government, the distribution of the amount recovered will be made by this Government without committal as to the mode of distribution. It is expected that all such committals will be avoided. (Geneva Award Papers, volume 2, page 416.)

What may have been the views of the then President of the United States, or of the Secretary of State, as to what constituted the Government of the United States, or of the rights and duties of that Government in respect to the moneys expected to be awarded by the tribunal of arbitration, or what inferences may be drawn from the language just quoted, further than as an expression of the desire of the President, and, perhaps, the Secretary, that the award should be in gross your committee deem it unnecessary here to discuss. Suffice it to say, the tribunal itself came to the conclusion that, "in accordance with the spirit and letter of the treaty of Washington, it was preferable to adopt the form of adjudication of a sum in gross rather than to refer the subject of compensation for further discussion and deliberation to a board of assessors as provided by article 10 of the treaty," and therefore proceeded "to award to the United States a sum of $15,500,000 in gold as the indemnity to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for the satisfaction of all the claims referred to the consideration of the tribunal, conformable to the provisions of article 7 of the aforesaid treaty." (Decision and Award, vol. 4, p. 53.)

The precise method by which this result was reached by the tribunal does not appear on its record, nor is it apparent by what consideration the arbitrators were influenced to award a sum in gross, further than may be inferred from their own statement quoted above, that it was preferable to adopt that form of adjudication "rather than to refer the subject of compensation for further discussion and deliberation to a board of assessors," coupled with the following extract copied from the argument of the American counsel, which was doubtless intended to show the disadvantages of the latter mode of procedure:

"They earnestly hope that the tribunal will exercise the power conferred upon it to award a sum in gross to be paid by Great Britain to the United States. The injuries of which the United States complain were committed many years since. The original wrongs to the sufferers by the acts of the insurgent cruisers have been increased by the delay in making reparation. It will be unjust to impose further delay, and the expense of presenting claims to another tribunal, if the evidence which the United States have the honor to present for the consideration of these arbitrators shall prove to be sufficient to enable them to determine what sum in gross would be a just compensation to the United States for the injuries and losses of which they complain." (See American case, p. 489.)

It is probable, therefore, that the controlling reason for this conclusion was that by awarding a gross sum to be distributed by such a tribunal as the Government of the United States might itself provide, the disagreements, difficulties, and delays which would be likely to arise in a discussion of the details of each particular case before assessors of different nationalities, conducted by American counsel on the one side and British counsel on the other, might be obviated. And it was doubtless for the same reason that the agent and counsel of the United States, as Mr. Davis says in his report to the State Department, (vol. 1, p. 8,) "devoted their energies toward securing such a sum as should be practically an indemnity to the sufferers."

In anticipation of the payment by Great Britain of the sum thus awarded to the United States, sundry bills were introduced into the Forty-second Congress looking to the establishment of some sort of tribunal for its adjudication and distribution. One of these passed the Senate and another the House. Subsequently a committee of conference was appointed upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, who finally agreed upon and reported a bill which was passed and approved March 3, 1873, providing that immediately upon the payment of the sum of money awarded to the United States by the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva the same should be paid into the Treasury, and used to redeem, so far as it might, the public debt of the United States, and that an amount equal to the debt so redeemed should be invested in the 5 per cent. registered bonds of the United States, to be held subject to the future disposition of Congress. The investment was accordingly made, and thus the matter stood until the assembling of the Forty-third Congress, in the first session of which numerous propositions were presented, looking to the adjudication and distribution of the fund.

As to what disposition should be made of it, however, there existed among the ablest and best-enlightened legal minds of the country, who had given the subject the most careful and elaborate consideration, the widest diversity of opinion, resulting to some extent, no doubt, from a difference in the various interests respectively represented by them.

For instance, there were those who contended with great earnestness and zeal that the claims out of which this fund arose "were all preferred by the United States as a nation against Great Britain as a nation;" that the whole subject was disensed by the counsel of the United States before the tribunal as the President desired and directed it to be, namely, "as one between two governments;" that the sum awarded was computed and paid as a reparation by one nation for the wrongs it had done to another nation, and that consequently the fund was the absolute property of the United States, freed from all trusts or conditions whatever; that it belonged as much to one citizen as another, and that Congress had no right, under the Constitution, to appropriate any portion of it to the payment of any claim whatever, unless the relation of creditor and debtor existed between the claimant and the Government.

On the other hand, there were those who, while admitting that the fund belonged absolutely to the United States "as a nation," contended with equal zeal and ability that it was competent for Congress to distribute it ex gratia among such of the citizens of the country who had suffered injury from the operations of the confederate cruisers, or by reason of their presence on the high seas, as, in its judgment, might seem proper under all the circumstances, whether such injury was inflicted by one of the vessels for whose acts Great Britain was held responsible, or any of those for whose transactions she was exculpated by the judgment of the tribunal, or whether the nature of their injuries "constituted, upon principles of international law applicable to such cases, good foundation for an award of compensation, or computation of damages between nations" or not, and without reference to whether their claims had been considered or excluded by the arbitrators at Geneva.

Under this view it was urged, with singular earnestness and force, that there were two classes of sufferers whose claims were peculiarly entitled to the favorable consideration of the Government: first, those whose vessels and cargoes had been captured or destroyed by the "exculpated cruisers;" and second, those who, in order to keep their ships afloat under the flag of their country, had been compelled to pay largely enhanced rates of insurance.

In behalf of the former it was maintained that the loss of the owner whose vessel was destroyed by an "exculpated cruiser" was as great as if such cruiser had been inculpated; and as grievous if the destruction had been caused by the Shenandoah eight and forty hours before she entered the port of Melbourne as if it had occurred a week or a fortnight afterward; and for the latter it was claimed that those exorbitant rates of insurance resulted directly from the acts or omissions of Great Britain in permitting the cruisers to be fitted out and soiled from her waters, while the parties who were compelled to pay them could hope to derive no possible profit therefrom, but merely an indemnification from loss, and while the exigency which demanded this extraordinary expenditure by the merchant originated in no fault of his own; that it was not even optional with him whether he would engage in ocean-borne commerce or not, for the insurgent cruisers found his fortune embarked in it when they first vexed the face of the deep; and his vessel, if abroad, was subject to capture and destruction on its homeward voyage, or, if at home, it must rot piecemeal at the wharf or brave "not only the perils of the sea, but the peril of capture;" that he was therefore obliged to pay these enhanced rates of insurance, or lose his vessel at home, or incur the risk of losing it abroad; and while he was thus at the mercy of the underwriter, who could demand such premium as he chose, "he could not charge the premium so paid either upon his freights or in the profits on his goods, because a large portion of the American tonnage was transferred to a foreign flag; and, moreover, the foreign vessel, paying no war premium, taking no risk of capture, did the carrying trade of the world in competition with the American ship-owner, who had to bring his freights down not only to a level with the freights of the neutral, but still lower, so as to enable the shipper to pay his war premium also upon his goods."

In conflict with these views, it was contended by others that the allegiance of the citizen and protection of the State were the reciprocal obligations of the social compact; that although the individual citizen had not the power to enforce its performance, it was nevertheless the highest moral duty of the Government to protect him in the possession and enjoyment of his property from wrong and depredation at home by the just administration of adequate municipal laws, and from capture and spoliation abroad by interposing in his behalf and demanding reparation for him from the nation responsible for the wrong, enforcing that demand, if needs be, by "the last argument to which kings resort;" that having thus obtained redress from a foreign country for an injury to one of its citizens, although demanded and received by it "as a nation from a nation," the Government had no more right, in natural equity, to appropriate the money so received to its own use, or to apply it in payment of the claims of those for whose benefit it had not been awarded, than it had to seize his property for public use without compensation, or to confiscate his estate for the promotion or endowment of some private charity; but was under the strongest obligation that justice, honor, morality, and the soundest principles of an enlightened public policy could impose, to pay it to him, and to him only, for whose indemnity it was demanded, upon whose loss it was computed, and for whose satisfaction it was adjudged.

Their theory was clearly and succinctly expressed by Mr. Caleb Cushing, the senior counsel of the United States at Geneva, in a letter dated October 17, 1872, while the laurels of his most famous forensic triumph were yet fresh and green upon his brow, when he was perhaps more familiar with the subject of which he was writing than any other man living, and when he said that—

"In the case of the 'Alabama claims' the United States will have in their hands a definite sum of money, awarded against England by the tribunal of arbitration, and paid over by England to the United States for distribution among the parties interested according to the award of the tribunal.

* * * * * *

"The tribunal, in the first place, adjudged Great Britain to be guilty in respect of captures made by the Alabama and the Florida and their tenders, and by the Shenandoah after her departure from Melbourne.

"The tribunal, in the second place, examined and scrutinized the schedules and estimates of individual losses presented by the United States, and on the inspection thereof awarded a sum in gross which they conceived to be sufficient (and which I think is sufficient) to afford a just indemnity to the injured citizens of the United States.

"This gross sum will within the year be paid by Great Britain to the United States, with interest on any delay; it will be received and held by the United States as a trust fund, to be distributed among parties interested, conformably to the tenor and spirit of the award of the tribunal; and the Government will be bound to make such distribution promptly and justly by the moral force of its duty of good faith to England and its obligations to fulfill the stipulations of the treaty of Washington.

"There is no contingency or uncertainty in all this. You and the other parties in interest may, I do not hesitate to say, rest assured of the honor and good faith of the Government of the United States in this respect with just as much of certitude as in the payment of the gold bonds of the Government."

As a corrollary to this general proposition, that this "gross sum" was "received and held by the United States as a trust fund, to be distributed among the parties interested, conformably to the tenor and spirit of the award of the tribunal," it was claimed that those who had suffered losses directly from the acts of the three "inculpated cruisers," under the circumstances in which Great Britain was held responsible for their transactions, had a paramount claim to the money awarded; because, first, it was for such losses and such losses alone that Great Britain was held liable; and, second, they constituted the sole basis for the computation of the "gross sum," which must, therefore, have been awarded with the view of their payment; and that the insurer who had paid such a loss was entitled, upon principles of natural equity repeatedly recognized by the most enlightened tribunals of both countries, to be subrogated to all the rights of the original loser in respect of the thing lost.

Another conclusion from the premises assumed by this class was that no sufferer by any other cruiser than the Alabama or the Florida, or their tenders, or by the Shenandoah after her departure from the port of Melbourne, was entitled to or had any claim to any portion of this fund, for the reason that the tribunal had expressly decided that Great Britain was under no obligation whatever to pay any such loss, and because no such loss was contemplated by the arbitrators, or constituted any element in the computation of the sum awarded, and, moreover, that no person could have any claim upon any part of this money on account of any enhanced rate of insurance or war premium paid by him, not only because the tribunal of arbitration had unanimously decided to exclude, and did exclude, with the approval of both governments, all such claims from any consideration in making its award on the ground that such claims did "not constitute, upon the principles of international law applicable to the case, good foundation for an award of compensation or computation of damages between nations," (see protocols v, vi, and vii, cited supra,) but because the Government of the United States, when it presented such claims to the consideration of the tribunal, neither expected nor desired any pecuniary compensation to be awarded therefor, but only presented them in order to have the liability of a neutral for claims of that character adjudicated and settled.*

On the other hand, those who held that it was competent for the Government to distribute this fund ex gratia to whomsoever it might see proper, urged with great earnestness and force that of all claims that could be presented for any part of this fund that of the insurer might, and in many instances would, be the most inequitable and unconscientious; for if the amount of his premiums or other profits in respect to or on account of his war risks had exceeded the sum of his losses on account of such risks, he was an absolute gainer, instead of having been a sufferer, from the operations of the confederate cruisers upon the high seas.

As was natural under such a contrariety of opinion, the entire subject, in all its aspects, underwent a most learned and elaborate discussion. Carefully prepared reports were presented, in which the different views with regard to the proper distribution of the fund were argued with singular clearness and force. Conferences were had upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and the final result was the passage of an act, approved June 24, 1874, creating a court to be known as the "court of commissioners of Alabama claims," making it the duty of that court to receive and examine all claims admissible under said act that might be presented to it, directly resulting from damage caused by the so-called insurgent cruisers Alabama, Florida, and their tenders, and by the Shenandoah after her departure from Melbourne, on the 18th of February, 1865, and to decide upon the amount and validity of such claims in conformity with the provisions thereinafter contained, and according to the principles of law, and the merits of the several cases, requiring all such claims to be verified by the oath of the claimant, and filed within said court within six months after the organization thereof, and providing that no claims should be admissible or allowed by said court for any loss or damage for which the claimant had received compensation or indemnity from an insurance company or otherwise, except in cases where the compensation or indemnity so received was not equal to the loss or damage actually suffered, in which an allowance might be made for the difference; and also expressly excluding from allowance all claims in respect to or on account of unearned freights, gross freights, prospective profits, freights, gains, or advantages, or for wages of officers or seamen for a longer time than one year next after the breaking up of a voyage by the act of some one of the cruisers mentioned, or in behalf of any insurer or insurance company, unless such claimant should show to the satisfaction of the court that during the rebellion the sum of his or its losses by reason of his or its war risks was greater than the amount of his or its profits or other gains in respect to such risks, in which case the court might make an allowance to the claimant not exceeding such excess of his loss, or in favor of any insurance company not lawfully existing at the time of the loss under the laws of some one of the United States, or of any person not entitled at the time of his loss to the protection of the United States in the premises, or of any person who did not at all times during the rebellion bear true allegiance to the United States.

By the court organized in pursuance of the provisions of this act, circumscribed by the limitations and restrictions just recited, claims were allowed amounting to the sum of $6,183,889, and having by the terms of the act creating it, and those of a supplemental act approved July 22, 1876, extending its existence until the 1st of January, 1877, expired by limitation, there is left a balance of the sum, amounting to $9,316,120, for the distribution of which the present Congress has been called upon to provide by the several bills in relation thereto referred to your committee.

With regard to this balance, however, Congress is confronted with the same variety of conflicting claims and the same diversity of opinion with respect thereto

* Mr. Fish, in his telegram to Mr. Davis, the agent of the United States at Geneva of June 22, 1872, already quoted in this report, said: "I have laid your telegram before the President, who directs me to say that he accepts the declaration of the tribunal as its judgment upon a question of public law which he had felt that the interest of both governments required should be decided, and for the determination of which he had felt it important to present the claims referred to for the purpose of taking the opinion of the tribunal. This is the attainment of an end which this Government had in view in the putting forth of those claims. We had no desire for a pecuniary award, but desired an expression by the tribunal as to the liability of neutrals for claims of that character. The President, therefore, further accepts the opinion and advice of the counsel as set forth above, and authorizes the announcement to the tribunal that he accepts their declaration as determination of their judgment upon the important question of public law upon which he felt it his duty to seek the expression of their opinion, and that in accordance with such judgment and opinion, from henceforth, he regards the claims set forth in the case presented on the part of the United States for loss in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag, the enhanced payments of insurance, and the prolongation of the war, and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion, as adjudicated and disposed of; and that, consequently, they will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, but are henceforth excluded from its consideration by the tribunal in making its award." (Papers, volume 2, page 579.)

as at the outset. It is presumed that no person has preferred a claim to any portion of it without being satisfied of his right to it, upon principles of natural equity growing out of the circumstances of the case. Yet it is manifest that some of them must be wrong, and if any of these claimants are entitled to this fund as a matter of right, it cannot be justly apportioned among others as an act of grace. In a word, if it be true that any particular claimant, or class of claimants, has an equitable right to any portion of this money, that right must necessarily have resulted from certain principles of natural justice or moral duty on the part of the Government, existing at the time the claim accrued, which Congress has no moral power to abrogate or evade by subsequent legislation, and an attempt by Congress to divest any such right by directing the distribution of the fund among others not entitled to it upon principles of natural equity equally clear would be as repugnant to the spirit of our Constitution as it would have been to have seized the ship or other thing in respect of which the right accrued, for public use without just compensation to the owner. Moreover, it cannot be denied that the duty of determining the right in cases of disputed or conflicting claim pertains legitimately to the judicial department of the Government, to be performed by it, either through the instrumentality of the regularly organized courts of the country, or such special tribunal as the legislative department may see proper to establish.

Your committee are therefore of the opinion that it would not only be wise and just, but far more in harmony with the genius of our Government, to remove all these disputed questions of private right from the arena of legislation, where the judgment may be biased by local interests and personal prejudice, or obscured by the heat and confusion of debate, and where the machinery is too cumbrous and complicated, the time too limited, the opportunity for investigation too restricted, and the variety of business too great, for the proper administration of distributive justice, to a forum where the rights of all parties claiming an interest in this fund can be deliberately adjudicated and determined by an impartial and dispassionate tribunal, "according to the principles of justice, equity, and the laws of nations."

Your committee are by no means singular in arriving at this conclusion, nor is their suggestion at all new or original with themselves. On the contrary, it is in exact harmony with the settled practice of the Government under similar circumstances for half a century or more, as may be shown by numerous precedents. For instance, in pursuance of a convention between the United States and Great Britain at London, on the 13th of November, 1826, the latter paid to this Government the sum of $1,204,960, "in lieu of and in full and complete satisfaction of all sums claimed or claimable from Great Britain by any person or persons whatever under the convention" between the two governments of 1822. In that convention article 4 provided that, the above sum "being taken as a full and final liquidation of all claims whatsoever arising under the said decision and convention, both the final adjustment of those claims and the distribution of said sum should be made in such manner as the United States alone should determine." Yet it does not appear to have been even suggested that because this sum was paid to the United States "in gross" they could justly keep it, or distribute it ex gratia to whomsoever Congress in its discretion might direct. On the contrary, by an act of Congress, approved March 2, 1827, a board, consisting of three commissioners and one clerk, was created, which was authorized to consider the evidence presented by the respective claimants, and "thereupon proceed to determine the said claims, and to award distribution of the said fund among the several claimants according to their respective rights." (Statutes at Large, volume 4, page 219.)

Again, in the first article of the convention between the United States and Denmark, at Copenhagen, March 28, 1830, it was agreed that the King of Denmark should pay to the Government of the United States the sum of six hundred and fifty thousand Spanish milled dollars on account of the citizens of the United States who had preferred claims relating to the seizure, detention, condemnation, or confiscation of their vessels, cargoes, or property by the public and private armed ships or by the tribunals of Denmark, or in the states subject to the Danish scepter. "By article 3 it was provided that, to ascertain the full amount and validity of those claims, a board of commissioners, consisting of three citizens of the United States, should be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to "receive, examine, and decide upon the amount and validity of all such claims according to the merits of the several cases and to justice, equity, and the law of nations." And in pursuance of this provision, evidently inserted in the convention at the suggestion and for the benefit of the United States, Congress, by an act approved March 2, 1831, provided for the appointment of the commissioners, authorizing them to receive, examine, and decide upon the amount and validity of all such claims according to the merits of the several cases and to justice, equity, and the law of nations. (Statutes at Large, volume 4, page 446.)

Again, in article 1 of the convention between the United States and France, signed at Paris on the 4th of July, 1831, "the French government, in order to liquidate itself completely from all the reclamations preferred against it by citizens of the United States for unlawful seizures, captures, sequestrations, confiscations, or destructions of their vessels, cargoes, or other property, engages to pay the sum of 25,000,000 francs to the Government of the United States, who shall distribute it among those entitled in the manner and according to the rules which it shall determine." And in order to provide for the distribution of the "gross sum" thus derived, Congress, by an act approved July 13, 1832, created a board, consisting of three commissioners, who were authorized to receive and examine such claims according to the provisions of the convention, "and the principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations." (Statutes at Large, volume 4, page 574.)

By the first article of the convention between the United States and the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, signed at Naples on the 14th of October, 1832, the king, in order to satisfy the claims of American merchants whose vessels and cargoes had been seized and confiscated or destroyed by Murat from the year 1809 to 1812, inclusive, obliged himself to pay to the United States the sum of 2,115,000 Neapolitan ducats, 7,679 of which were to reimburse the United States for the expenses incurred by the Government in the transportation of American seamen from the kingdom of Naples during the year 1810, and the residue to be distributed among the claimants by the Government of the United States in such manner and in accordance with such rules as it might prescribe; and in order to effect the distribution of that residue the Congress, by an act approved March 2, 1833, established a commission of three to receive and examine the claims "according to the provisions of the convention and the principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations." (Statutes at Large, volume 4, page 666.)

In like manner Congress, by an act approved June 7, 1836, authorized the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint one commissioner, to receive and examine all claims presented to him under the convention between the United States and Spain, signed at Madrid on the 17th of February, 1834, "according to the provisions of the same and the principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations," (Statutes at Large, vol. 5, p. 35,) that convention having provided for the payment of the sum of 12,000,000 of reals by Spain to the United States, "to be distributed by the Government of the United States among the claimants thereto in such manner as it might deem just and equitable."

On the 17th of March, 1841, a convention between the United States and Peru was signed at Lima, in which the Peruvian government stipulated to pay to the United States $300,000 in satisfaction of various claims of citizens of the United States on account of seizures, captures, detentions, sequestrations, and confiscations of their vessels, cargoes, and other property, which should be distributed by the Government of the United States among the claimants in the manner and according to such rules as it might prescribe; and Congress, by an act approved August 8, 1846, authorized and empowered the Attorney-General to adjudicate and decide the claims that might be presented under that convention "according to the merits of the several cases and the principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations." (Statutes at Large, volume 9, page 80.)

A convention was concluded between the United States and Brazil at Rio Janeiro on the 7th of January, 1849, under somewhat peculiar circumstances. It seems that the United States were so impressed with the justice of certain claims for which they demanded indemnity, and Brazil so thoroughly satisfied of their injustice, that they deemed it useless to go into any examination of them at all, but agreed upon the sum of 530,000 milreis, "which should comprehend the whole of the reclamations whatever might be their nature and amount, and as full compensation for the indemnifications claimed by the Government of the United States to be paid in a round sum, without reference to any one of said claims, upon the merits of which the two high contracting powers refrained from entering; it being left to the Government of the United States to estimate the justice that might pertain to the claimants for the purpose of distributing among them the aforesaid sum of 530,000 milreis as it might deem most proper." (See article 1 of the convention.) And in order to provide for the distribution of the sum so received, Congress, by an act approved March 20, 1850, authorized the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint one commissioner to receive and decide all claims thereto, "according to the merits of the several cases, and the principles of justice, equity, the law of nations, and the stipulation of said convention." (Statutes at Large, volume 11, page 422.)

Under the convention with China, signed at Shanghai on the 8th of November, 1858, five hundred thousand taels, equivalent to about $700,000, were paid to the United States "in full liquidation of all claims of American citizens at the various ports" of China to that date; and for the distribution of this fund Congress, by an act approved March 3, 1859, authorized the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint two commissioners who should form a board in China to receive and examine all claims which should be presented to them under said convention, "according to the provisions of the same, the principles of justice and international law." (Statutes at Large, volume 11, page 408.)

Upon reviewing the precedents, it will be observed that there is not a particle of difference in principle between either of them and the case under consideration. In every one of them a gross sum was paid to the United States, and in all of them except two it was expressly stipulated that the United States should distribute it among the various claimants, in such manner and under such rules as the Government might determine, and in one of those two the convention was silent as to the distribution while in the other it was provided that it should be made by commissioners. Yet in not a single one of them did Congress ever pretend to determine what particular claimants should be paid and who should not, but in every instance provided an independent tribunal to which it submitted, not the mere determination of amounts nor the question who were entitled to particular sums, but the determination of the rights of all the various claimants, according to the broad principles of justice, equity, and international law.

Nor is this all. This very Congress has itself affirmed the correctness of your committee's conclusions in this regard in the clearest and most forcible manner possible, and that but little more than a month ago. On the 5th of March last, Hon. Mr. CRAPO, of Massachusetts, submitted the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who having had under consideration the petition of the Sun Mutual Insurance Company, the Mercantile Mutual Insurance Company, the New York Mutual Insurance Company, and the China Mutual Insurance Company, for relief in the matter of the bark Caldera and her cargo, unanimously recommended the passage of "an act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to carry into effect the convention between the United States and China, concluded on the 8th day of November, 1858, at Shanghai,' approved March 3, 1859, and to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction in certain cases." In their report the committee said:

"That the said companies are entitled to the relief asked for, and the committee hereby recommend the passage of the bill annexed to this report, giving the Court of Claims jurisdiction in the case, the facts of which appear to be as follows:

"The bark Caldera, under the command of Mathew Rooney, an American citizen, being laden with a cargo belonging to American merchants, sailed from the port of Hong-Kong on the 5th day of October, 1854, bound to the port of San Francisco; and, having been obliged to seek shelter from a storm, in the port of Keolan, on the Chinese coast, was, while at anchor there and the crew employed at the pumps, to keep the vessel free of water, boarded by armed bands of Chinese, who drove the men from the pumps, took possession of the vessel, and, after plundering her of all the cargo except granite in the lower hold, burned her, and she became a total loss.

"The petitioning insurance companies paid insurance to the amount of $72,512, being a total loss of the whole sum insured, besides a considerable sum in addition, expended in an unsuccessful effort to recover the property.

"The petitioners took all the necessary steps to establish a valid claim on the Chinese government for the amount of the loss, and Mr. Marcy, then Secretary of State, in a dispatch to Dr. Parker, fully recognized the justice of the claim, and directed its prosecution before the Chinese government.

"In 1858 Mr. Reed, the then American minister, made a convention with the Chinese government, securing indemnity for this as well as other claims, and about $700,000 was paid by the Chinese government, a large portion of which is still held by the State Department, awaiting the disposition of Congress.

"Mr. Reed recommended that the claim of the Caldera should be adjudicated at home, because the evidence could be there most easily produced. Meanwhile, under an act of Congress, passed in 1859, commissioners were appointed to pass upon all claims upon this Chinese indemnity fund. These commissioners held their sessions at Macao, in China, and to them the papers in the Caldera case were forwarded by Mr. Cass, then Secretary of State. The claim was duly filed with the commissioners, who made a deduction therefrom of 60 per cent., on the ground of a supposed prior damage by sea-water to the cargo. This deduction appears to have been made without sufficient evidence of its justice, and under a misapprehension of the law applicable to the case, and the claimants had no opportunity of being heard upon the question. They were told that the acceptance of the 50 per cent. allowed them would not preclude a rehearing of the case at Washington; but as the act of 1859 did not provide for an appeal from the decision of the commissioners, such a rehearing cannot be had without an act of Congress.

"Your committee are satisfied, from the evidence submitted to them, that it is but just that the underwriters should be allowed to present the evidence which, if they had time or proper notice, would have been presented to the commissioners, to some competent tribunal for a final decision as to the justice of their claim. Other claims presented to the commission, and which were disallowed by it, have been reviewed and paid from this fund. The case of the Neva, which was of like character to this, was entirely rejected by the commissioners, but the claimants by act of Congress were allowed a rehearing before the Attorney-General, who decided that the conclusions of the commissioners were erroneous, and payment was accorded to them. Your committee are of the opinion that the Court of Claims is the tribunal by which questions of this character should be heard and determined."

The first section of the bill provided "that any person or persons, or body-corporate, holding and making any claim upon the balance of the fund usually designated and known as the 'Chinese indemity fund,' under the control of the Department of State of the United States, and now unappropriated, for losses sustained by the plunder and destruction, in the year 1854, of the bark Caldera, and property on board of said vessel, may, at any time within twelve months after the passage of this act, commence proceedings in the United States Court of Claims against the United States, in the same manner as other suits are brought pursuant to and in virtue of the statutes of the United States and the rules of said court; and that the said Court of Claims shall have full jurisdiction to hear and determine such claim or demand, according to the principles of justice and international law;" while the second made provision that either party, plaintiff or defendant, might appeal from the decision or judgment of the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner as now provided for in other cases. And this bill, thus unanimously reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, passed the House without a dissenting voice, after full explanation by Mr. CRAPO. (See Congressional Record, March 5, 1878, pages 1483, 1484.)

Confirmed by the uniformity of these precedents in their conclusion that the determination of all the claims that may be set up to the balance of this fund should be remitted to some independent tribunal with authority to decide upon the rights of the various claimants according to the broad principles of natural justice, equity, and international law, unembarrassed by any special legislative discrimination for or against any individual or class, it was next to be determined by your committee whether it would be preferable to confer that authority upon some one of the regularly constituted courts of the United States, or to create a special commission to adjudicate the questions involved in the distribution of the remainder of this money.

To the establishment of a special commission they found many serious objections, which, however, they could not hope to express with anything like the clearness and force with which they are set forth in the following extract from the very able report of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Forty-third Congress through its distinguished chairman, Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, when a similar proposition was made while this same matter was under consideration, and when it was the unanimous opinion of that committee that it would be better to submit the adjudication of these claims to a circuit court of the United States, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court. The committee then said:

"The only antagonism of which your committee is aware to having the distribution of this fund settled by a suit in a single court, with the proper claimants made parties, comes from those who desire that a commission should be established, to sit in Washington, to adjudicate this matter. To this proposition your committee have most decided objections. Here are over $15,000,000 to be divided among certain claimants, who are urging their claims with all the zeal that private interests and large sums at stake can command, and it is well known that all Government claims of this description are generally taken in hand by a class of men known as claim agents, some of whom are admitted to the bar and some not, under no responsibility whatever to the commission, itself temporary, which can have no control over them or the propriety of their action, and, if they wrong either the clients or the Government, can administer no rebuke or punishment to them, who carry on this business of advocating claims upon the Government generally upon contingent fees and large percentages, the average of which is not lower, so far as your committee can learn, than 25 per cent.; and as the possibility of obtaining any reward for their services depends upon success, a quarter of this fund—with the accrued interest, nearly five millions—the amount of these fees which may or may not be realized, according as the commission can or cannot be moved in favor of the claimants, stands as a fund ready to be used by corrupt men to carry their purposes.

"Your committee do not believe it is wise to expose officers quasi judicial to such great temptation, and to put it in the power of interested parties to obtain claims against the Government through such great inducements as might be used under these circumstances. The prayer 'lead us not into temptation' has been ordained as necessary for the daily use and guidance of all Christian men for more than eighteen hundred years.

"Besides, the adjudications of this commission are necessarily final, as it is no part of the judicial system of the United States, so that your committee do not see how any appeal can be taken to the Supreme Court. Further, if this commission once gets itself established, there is great danger, by referring claims to it on other subject-matters, that it may be continued indefinitely, to say nothing of the very considerable expenses which would attend it, amounting to some fifty to one hundred thousand dollars, even if the Government could get five men fit to do this work, together with the other expenses, for that sum. Nor does your committee think it wise thus to add to the number of office-holders under the Government if its work can be done by the ordinary judicial machinery, which no one doubts. The record of commissions in matters of claims, as against governments, has not always been so bright and clear as to make it certain that the interest of the Government will be safe as against individual greed, while the United States can say with pride that the integrity of her highest judicial officers has never been questioned, and that of the lower very rarely, and as yet never proven.

"On the contrary, if these claims are brought before a court they must be advocated by members of its bar, who will be held responsible to the court for their action, and every adjudication must be made in open day, publishing to the world the grounds and reasons of it, and subject to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, as in other cases."

Your committee concluded, therefore, without expressing any opinion of their own in relation to the merits of any particular claim or class of claims to the unexpended balance of this fund, that it would be better as a precedent for future cases, better for the Government, and better for all parties claiming to have an equitable interest in it, to commit the adjudication and determination of all questions touching its distribution to the Court of Claims in the first instance, with the right in any party aggrieved to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, with authority to render a judgment in favor of each claimant who was an actual sufferer by the violation of the laws of neutrality by Great Britain for such an amount as in the opinion of the court he may be justly entitled to under the treaty and award, according to the principles of justice, equity, and the laws of nations, leaving the court unhampered by any principle of allowance, exclusion, inclusion, or distribution adopted in chapter 458 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress or by the tribunal created by that law. This seems to your committee pre-eminently just and fair, and surely no one who claims to have any right to any portion of this fund can object to having his claim thus adjudicated, especially as provision is made in the bill for the speediest possible determination of all disputed principles of law by the Supreme Court, unless he is afraid of justice.

It may be urged, however, that the provision requiring the Supreme Court to advance appeals in these cases will be a hardship to other suitors whose causes, even as the docket now stands, cannot be reached for perhaps two or three years; but while this may be true to a certain extent, the objection will be found to be more specious than real when it is remembered that all the claims to this fund are embraced in a very few classes, and that all the legal principles about which there can be any dispute will be presented and settled in perhaps one, and certainly not over three or four cases on appeal, involving probably not over a week's delay in the ordinary business of the court, if that.

The several provisions of the bill herewith reported will be readily apprehended upon reading them, and your committee deem it unnecessary to discuss them separately, as the bill is identical in principle and very similar in detail to the bill reported by Mr. CRAPO, and recently passed by the House with such singular unanimity.

J. PROCTOR KNOTT, Chairman.

Mr. MCMAHON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following as the VIEWS OF THE MINORITY:

For the first time in the history of the legislation of either branch of Congress the insurance companies have succeeded in persuading a majority of the Judiciary Committee into the recommendation of the bill advocated by them for the distribution of the Geneva award fund. As this bill now comes into the House with the approval of the committee, the undersigned, members of that committee, earnestly protest against it and ask that their reasons may be carefully considered. It proposes to do what neither the House nor the Senate has ever before approved. Indeed, it expressly overrules the previous solemn action of both Houses, after long and intelligent discussion, as expressed in the law of the 22d June, 1874; which law, with some amendments and new provisions, the minority propose to revive in their substitute.

It is plausibly made to appear in the report of the majority that the object of the committee is to give each person or corporation an equal chance by referring the controversy to the Court of Claims. Yet the purpose of the majority is made evident by its careful provision that insurance companies, no matter how successful in the war-risk business, shall not be excluded. The bill submitted pretends to be in the interest of actual sufferers only; yet the majority, instead of adopting the wise and equitable provisions of the law of June 22, 1874, determining when an insurance company was an actual loser, expressly refuses to permit the application of those provisions. And having distributed $9,000,000 of this fund upon one principle, the committee now proposes to adopt the opposite rule.

This ought not to be done without grave and good reasons. And it is not a sufficient reason to say, as is elaborately argued at great length in the report of the majority, that the action proposed is identical with the method of distribution of indemnity funds, other than the Geneva award; in other words, that there are precedents for it. All this was seriously and repeatedly urged in the Forty-second, Forty-third, and Forty-fourth Congresses without effect. Complicated questions arise, as we shall see, that require legislative action to do justice.

On the 9th day of September, A. D. 1873, the Government of the United States received from the government of Great Britain the sum of $15,500,000, the award made in our favor on the 14th day of September, A. D. 1872, by the tribunal of arbitration, held at Geneva, under the treaty of Washington. As soon as Congress met in December, A. D. 1872, bills were introduced into each House providing for the distribution of the money to be received, which was not payable by the terms of the treaty until one year after the award.

The Senate and House of Representatives of the Forty-second Congress took early action in anticipation of payment, but were unable to agree upon a mode of distribution; and upon the 3d of March, A. D. 1873, in the last days of the closing session, an act was passed ordering the payment of the money into the Treasury of the United States, and the investment of an equal amount in 5 per cent. registered bonds of the United States, "to be held subject to the future disposition of Congress." Each House passed a bill, the Senate on the 8th day of February, A. D. 1873, and the House of Representatives on the 14th day of the same month. From the beginning of this controversy there have been four principal rival claimants to the fund, as follows:

1. Persons having suffered damage by the acts of the cruisers Alabama, Florida, and Shenandoah after Melbourne, commonly known as the "inculpated cruisers." These parties, with few exceptions, were paid under the law of 1874.

2. Persons who suffered damage by the acts of the confederate cruisers Georgia, Sumter, Nashville, Tallahassee, Chickamauga, The Sallie, Jefferson Davis, Music, Boston, V. H. Joy, and the Shenandoah before reaching Melbourne, commonly designated the "exculpated cruisers," whose claims have not been paid and are disputed.

3. Insurers of vessels or cargoes, whether as persons or corporations; such insurers claiming, in every instance of loss paid by them, to be subrogated to the rights of the insured owner. Their claim to be paid has not been seriously contested when they were able to show a net loss in the business of assuming war risks. But their right to subrogation has been fiercely disputed, and, as will appear hereafter, denied by law, when they were unable to show that the sum of losses in respect to war risks exceeded the sum of premiums or other gains in the same business.

4. Persons who paid increased rates of insurance, known as war premiums, by reason of the presence of confederate cruisers upon the high seas. The claims of such persons have been constantly denied by the insurers, and between the insurers and the war-premium claimants the struggle has been steadily maintained.

Before proceeding to the merits of the controversy, a short history of the various bills, amendments, and laws that have been proposed, voted upon, or enacted by previous Congresses, or in either House, may not be without value or weight. It will show how utterly without precedent is the proposed action of the majority.

The first bill passed by the Senate, on the 8th day of February, A. D. 1873, to which allusion has been already made, provided compensation for those persons only who suffered loss or damage by the "inculpated" confederate cruisers. Insured persons were permitted to recover only their actual loss. Insurers were substantially excluded by the following provision:

"And no claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court by or in behalf of any insurance company or insurer, either in its or his own right, or as assignee or otherwise in the right of a person or party insured as aforesaid, unless such claimant shall show to the satisfaction of said court that during the late rebellion the sum of its or his losses, in respect of its or his war risks, exceeded the sum of its or his premiums or other gains upon or in respect to such war risks; and in case of any such allowance the same shall not be greater than such excess of loss."

Debate was concentrated upon a motion to strike this out. It failed, and the bill passed the Senate by a vote of 30 yeas to 18 nays.

The bill passed by the House of Representatives on the 14th day of February, A. D. 1873, (to which allusion has been already made,) provided for the payment of losses by the inculpated cruisers only, the payment of war-premium claimants, and the payment of such insurance companies or insurers as could show, by an exhibit of their books, that the war premiums received by them did not equal the losses they had suffered by the acts of all the confederate cruisers, inculpated or exculpated. An effort to include losses by exculpated cruisers and losses by the Shenandoah before leaving Melbourne failed. These claims had not then been argued in the House. A motion by Hon. CLARKSON POTTER, of New York, to strike out the clause providing indemnity to war-premium claimants and the clause limiting payment to insurers to the net loss in the business of war premiums, and to insert in lieu thereof a section providing for the payment of all losses by insurers without deduction of war premiums received by them, failed by a vote of 37 yeas to 157 nays. A substitute was offered by Hon. Luke Poland, of Vermont, providing for a general bill in equity in a circuit court to be designated by the President of the United States, to which all persons should be made defendants who had filed claims for damages by one of the inculpated cruisers, and leaving all questions of law and of fact to the said circuit court without any restriction or instruction, except that the loss or damage should be shown to have been caused by an inculpated cruiser. But it was not agreed to upon a call of the yeas and nays, the vote being—yeas 63, nays 125.

These bills in the House and Senate were independent of each other. The Senate did not agree to the House bill, the committee reporting adversely. The House by a two-third vote, under a suspension of the rules, subsequently substituted its bill by way of amendment for the Senate bill. There was a conference, which resulted in the law of March 3, for the investment of the money; and the Forty-second Congress adjourned finally without any disposition of the fund among the claimants.

On the 12th day of May, A. D. 1874, a bill was passed in the Senate of the United States which provided for the payment of losses by inculpated cruisers only, damages to be estimated upon the basis of gold coin at the time of the loss, with 4 per cent. interest; and for the transfer of the balance to the general fund of the United States Treasury. At this time the opinion prevailed that this bill would exhaust the fund. When it was sent to the House the Committee on the Judiciary reported it back with a substitute, which provided for the payment of all losses by both classes of cruisers, "exculpated" or "inculpated," for the payment of war premiums after the sailing of any confederate cruiser; but excluded insurers, un-loss the sum of their losses exceeded the amount of war premiums received. Interest was allowed at the rate of 5 per cent. A bill of interpleader was to be filed in a circuit court, which should settle all questions, with qualified right of appeal in certain cases to the Supreme Court. The following was contained in the bill:

"Provided, That mutual insurance companies who have paid a loss shall be indemnified, such indemnity to be divided among its members who contributed to pay such loss at the time; but no member of any mutual insurance company shall be indemnified for any war premium paid in such company."

Mr. FRYE, of Maine, of the committee, moved to strike out this proviso, stating that the committee "had been deliberately cheated into it by the misrepresentations of the insurance men." His motion was agreed to—ayes 137, noes not counted. Mr. Poland, of Vermont, offered his substitute, proposing to refer the whole subject to a circuit court to be designated by the President, which court should pass, without restriction or instruction, upon all claims for losses by the act of any "inculpated" cruiser. It made provision for no other claims. This substitute, which received the support of the adherents of the insurance companies, was defeated by a vote of 92 yeas to 149 nays; and the bill of the committee was adopted—yeas 182, nays 101.

Upon a subsequent conference between the House and the Senate, the Senate bill was agreed to with a few modifications. The coin basis for estimate of damages was abandoned. The provision turning the balance into the Treasury was stricken out; and the clause inserted for the payment of other claims in future by Congress. A few other immaterial alterations were made, and the law of June 23, 1874, was passed. This law had a provision, as we have seen, that insurance companies could recover only their net loss in the business of assuming war risks, which was a distinct business from the general one.

The court of commissioners of Alabama claims organized under this law on the 23d day of July, A. D. 1874. Its duration was extended to January 22, 1876, by proclamation of the President, under section 8 of the statute, and by act of Congress to the 23d day of July, A. D. 1876, at which time it expired. The total amount awarded to persons entitled under this bill, including interest, was $9,316,120.

On the 6th day of July the subject came up, after long discussion, for final disposition in the House of Representatives of the Forty-fourth Congress, and a bill was passed in the House reviving the court, for the period of a year and more, giving it power to hear and pay claims for losses by all confederate cruisers and war-premium claimants. This bill revived the law of June 22, 1874, and the provision therein contained as to insurance companies.

A substitute was offered by Mr. KNOTT, of Kentucky, then, as now, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, proposing to amend the law of June 23, A. D. 1874, by reviving it, but striking out so much of section 12 as restricted the amount recoverable by insurers to the amount of their net loss in the business, giving them a right to file their claims and reviving the court for that purpose only. Mr. Lawrence, of Ohio, offered an amendment to Mr. KNOTT'S substitute, being also in the nature of a substitute. His proposition was to turn the balance of the Geneva fund into the Treasury. It was defeated by a vote of yeas 59, nays 109. Mr. KNOTT'S substitute was defeated by a vote of yeas 35, nays 151. Thus the House, by a decided vote again and for the third time, rejected the views of the insurance men; and the bill of the committee passed by a vote of yeas 107, nays 94. No action was taken upon this bill in the Senate, and the Forty-fourth Congress adjourned without providing any mode of distribution.

It will be seen that the Senate has never recognized the claims of insurers, except as modified in the law of 1874, which amounts to practical exclusion; and has never favorably considered the claims of the exculpated-cruiser claimants or of the war-premium sufferers. The House of Representatives has three times rejected the claims of insurers, except in cases of net loss; has twice provided for the payment of losses by exculpated cruisers; and has uniformly voted for the payment of the war-premium claims. The proposition of Mr. Poland, of Vermont, to refer the claims to some circuit court of the United States without instruction, except that they should grow out of the acts of an "inculpated cruiser," was defeated in the House by decided majorities in the Forty-second and the Forty-third Congresses. And a similar proposition offered in the Senate by Mr. CONKLING, of New York, was defeated by a vote of 34 nays to 23 yeas.

It was always supported by the advocates of the insurance companies, who believed that under the technical rules of courts of law they could recover their losses in every instance without being compelled to show up their gains in the multitude of risks taken where no losses occurred. And in the present Congress this proposition to refer the whole subject to the courts is the only one they have urged or advocated.

What shall be done with the remainder of this fund—now amounting to nearly $10,000,000—is one of the most important questions pending before Congress. The committee has heard many arguments upon the subject; it has had no lack of information upon the questions in issue. The proposition to cover the money into the Treasury of the United States has had no advocates and receives no support from any member of the committee, however divided upon other questions. It is true that the claims were prosecuted before the tribunal of arbitration by the United States as a nation, and that the award was made and the money paid to the Government of the United States. It is also true that no class of persons have a claim against the fund which they could prosecute to successful issue. But the fund was received by the Government in full satisfaction of all private as well as public claims against Great Britain. The Government of the United States upon several occasions distinctly disclaimed any desire for a money award in satisfaction of its claims as a nation as distinguished from the claims of individuals which had been presented by it. It was most interested in the preservation of peace, the maintenance of national honor, and the settlement of important principles for future use. To attain these ends it acquiesced in the rejection of all "national" claims, commonly designated as "indirect" damages. While it desired as large an award as justice would permit, it struggled for only a sufficient amount to make whole those of its citizens who had suffered actual losses. Under these circumstances it would be an act of gross injustice to retain this fund in the Treasury so long as a single sufferer remained unpaid. It is held under a moral obligation to do right in its distribution; and we are bound in conscience, as honest legislators, to divide it among those who have suffered loss or damage—having reasonable regard to the source from which the money came; that is to say, payment should not be made to any one who cannot show a close connection between his loss and the conduct of Great Britain in our civil war. We dismiss from further consideration the proposition to cover this fund into the Treasury of the United States. The Treasury is already too full of money not the property of the Government.

We come to the questions so long and hotly contested between the insurers and the war-premium claimants, the consideration of which involves the claims of those suffering damage by exculpated cruisers; for the argument of the insurer to exclude the war-premium claimants, if legally sound, would exclude the payment of damage by exculpated cruisers.

The argument of the insurance companies is substantially as follows: The claims for war premiums were rejected by the tribunal of arbitration, while the rights of the insurance companies were admitted, their claims computed by the British counsel, and allowed by the tribunal in the estimates by which the gross sum was arrived at; that the sum allowed was awarded to meet the individual losses caused by the inculpated cruisers and no others; that the United States Government received the award in trust for such sufferers; that in cases of insurance, the insurers stand in law and in equity in the shoes of the insured to the extent of the money paid by the insurer; that if in lieu of a sum in gross the damages had been referred, under article 10 of the treaty, to a board of assessors, the board could only have awarded damages to parties according "to the liability as decided by the arbitrators," which would have excluded war-premium claimants and losses by exculpated cruisers; that when a sum in gross was awarded, the duties that would have devolved upon the board of assessors under the treaty were transferred to the United States Government, and should be performed by it in the same manner as the treaty enjoined performance upon the board of assessors; that at an early day the rights of insurers were recognized by the Government, and their claims received and forwarded as valid claims against the British government. And the argument is pressed that the money in the hands of the Government is the money of the insurance companies, which they are prevented from recovering only by the general immunity of the Government from judicial pursuit.

These are plausible, technical arguments. They are vigorously urged by learned lawyers, and many distinguished statesmen have been convinced of their soundness.

In addition to these arguments, it is urged upon us that the questions involved are complicated legal ones fit only for judicial decision; that neither the Judiciary Committee nor the House of Representatives are constituted to pass upon them properly.

The bill proposed by the majority of the committee pretends to be in the interest of actual sufferers only. The substitute proposed by us differs from this bill in defining who are to be regarded as actual sufferers, as all previous Congresses have done. Is this a question of law? Is it a question unfit for a Judiciary Committee or too complicated for the House of Representatives? By no means. It is a question of fact peculiarly within the province of the legislative power. Should this question be referred to the Court of Claims in the general terms proposed in the bill of the majority, coupled with the express admonition that the rule laid down in the law of 1874 in regard to insurance companies should not apply, that court might make the mistake, and probably would, that an insurance company was an actual loser when it had paid only a single loss of $100,000, although in its war-risk business alone it had received premiums, where there were no losses, to the extent of $1,000,000? No Congress could ever make that mistake. Three Congresses have already spoken, the Forty-second, Forty-third, and Forty-fourth, and we have no fear as to what will be the result in the Forty-fifth. Is it a question of law as to whether one who was compelled to pay excessive war premiums by reason of the action of Great Britain was an actual loser? And can it be doubted that one whose ship or cargo was destroyed by an exculpated cruiser was an actual loser?

There can be no difficulty in our defining what we mean by an actual loser, as was done in the law of 1874. And there is great propriety in our doing it in the case of insurance companies. Let us take an instance. Suppose the Atlantic Mutual has received a premium of $1,000 on the Brilliant, and paid $50,000 loss for her destruction. The company files its claim under the law proposed by the majority. It is an actual loser in that case to the extent of $49,000. But it has had a hundred other risks, in each of which it has received $1,000 premium, without a cent of loss. It is therefore an actual gainer by the conduct of Great Britain to the extent of $51,000 over and above all losses. The bill of the majority would pay this company $49,000 and many years' interest. The substitute of the minority would not. The bill of the majority would refer the case to the court and prevent it from taking into consideration the other gains of the company in the same business. The substitute would compel the court to examine the fact before it would permit any person or corporation to share in an indemnity fund.

So far, then, as this question is concerned it is eminently proper and just that Congress should define what it means by "actual losers" before it hands these claims over to any tribunal for adjudication. That tribunal could not take into its consideration all the motives actuating our Government in its conduct before the tribunal of arbitration. Without definite instruction it would be bound by the narrow, strict, and technical rules that have been erected into a grand judicial system for the judgment of causes between man and man, and could not be guided by the high principles of natural equity which would control the sovereign power in the proper distribution of an indemnity fund. It could not relieve a sufferer by the acts of the Georgia or the Shenandoah before Melbourne; but it might be compelled to add millions of dollars to the coffers of the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company of New York, already filled with millions of dollars of profit from the very business of assuming war risks. Yet both these ships, whose acts it would exclude, were essentially British built, manned, and equipped, although exonerated by the tribunal. The Georgia was so notoriously British that when she entered the port of Liverpool in the month of ——, A. D. 186—, she became the subject of discussion in Parliament. Mr. T. Baring said of her on the floor of the house:

"She remained the property of this person (a Liverpool merchant) until the 23d of June, when the register was canceled, he notifying the collector of her sale to foreign owners. During this period, viz., from the 1st of April to the 23d of June, the Georgia, being still registered in the name of a Liverpool merchant, and thus his property, was carrying on war against the United States with whom we were in alliance. It was while she was still a British vessel that she captured and burnt the Dictator, and captured and released under bond the Griswold, the same vessel which had brought corn to the Lancashire sufferers."

Mr. Cobden, during the same discussion, spoke of her and the conduct of Great Britain as follows:

"What is the fact? You have been carrying on war from these shores with the United States, and have been inflicting an amount of damage on the country greater than could be produced by many ordinary wars. It is estimated that the loss sustained by the capture and burning of American vessels has been about $15,000,000. But that is a small part of the injury which has been inflicted on the American marine. You have rendered the rest of her vast mercantile property useless. * * * If you raise the rate of insurance on the flag of any maritime power, you throw the trade into the hands of its competitors, because it is no longer profitable for merchants or manufacturers to employ ships to carry freights when those vessels become liable to great war risks.

* * * * * * * *

"I hold in my hand an account of the foreign trade of New York for the quarter ending June 30, 1860, and also for the quarter ending June 30, 1863, which is the last date up to which a comparison is made. I find that the total amount of the foreign trade of New York for the first period was $92,000,000, of which $62,000,000 was carried in American bottoms, and $30,000,000 in foreign. This state of things rapidly changed as the war continued, for it appears that for the quarter ending June 30, 1863, the foreign trade of New York was $88,000,000, of which $23,000,000 were carried in American vessels, and $65,000,000 in foreign; the change brought about being that while in 1860 two-thirds of the commerce of New York was carried in American bottoms, in 1863 three-fourths were carried in foreign bottoms."

Yet the owner of the ship Dictator, a sufferer to the extent of $100,000, can receive no relief under the bill of the majority, according to the law of the advocates of the insurance companies. And the owner of the ship Delphine, destroyed by the Shenandoah a few days before she reached Melbourne, cannot be paid under it. Yet both these parties were actual losers to a large amount, and would be excluded from participation in the indemnity fund by the peculiar language of the bill of the majority confining payment to those who were supposed to be recognized by the tribunal of arbitration.

In fact the bill is carefully drawn, so that if any person can have relief under it, which is doubtful, no one can succeed except the already gorged insurance companies. Should they be permitted to succeed? If they have a clear legal or equitable right it should be respected; but if, on the other hand, this fund is an indemnity fund for actual sufferers held by our Government in its sovereign capacity to distribute according to the fact to actual sufferers by the improper and hostile conduct of Great Britain, we should not permit corporations to share in it for whom that conduct created a new and profitable business, and who realized, in consequence, enormous dividends out of the misfortunes of their fellow-citizens.

There is eminent justice in requiring them to account for gains. Their business is that of the receipt of premiums and the payment of losses. They were not engaged in any general business of buying and selling. Their profits depended on no fluctuations of the market arising from excessive supply or limited demand. The war risk business was a separate venture, kept apart from the ordinary insurance business, as was demonstrated before the committee. Hence to compel them to make a showing of their whole business, which consisted solely in the receipt and payment of money alone, is no injustice when they claim to be sufferers by the conduct of Great Britain. The truth is, and was, that Great Britain created a new business for them which was profitable.

The undersigned are of the opinion that the fund in question is an indemnity fund. They believe it was awarded to us as a nation. They believe that no person or corporation has a legal or equitable right to any portion of it. They regard it a fund for actual sufferers by the conduct of Great Britain. And they recognize no obligation upon the Government, in consequence of anything that transpired at Geneva, to give it any particular direction. The tribunal of arbitration dealt with the questions submitted only for the purpose of arriving at an amount to be paid by Great Britain to the United States. It remitted the distribution of the award to our Government. No claimant was permitted to be heard at Geneva. And the amount was arrived at without permitting contest between the rival claimants, and without satisfactory knowledge to the world of what claims were actually embraced in it. Hence the agent of the United States, in his report to the Government, says, volume 4 of the papers relating to the treaty:

"The deliberations of the tribunal on the subject of damages were held with closed doors. * * * It does not appear in the protocol how the arbitrators arrived at the amount."

There is nothing in the treaty of Washington directing the method of distribution; and it would have been grossly indelicate and extrajudicial in the tribunal of arbitration to have prescribed any rule of action to the sovereign power of the United States. The board of assessors was not convened. A gross sum was awarded at the earnest request of our Government; and whatever might have been the equitable rights of individuals if the board of assessors had been called together and had passed upon each individual claim, awarding a definite sum in each case to the party entitled, it is sufficient to say that this was not done. This is a complete answer to the whole argument. The very reason it was not done was because of England's indifference as to the persons to be indemnified and our own anxiety to be permitted to distribute this fund as a sovereign nation, dealing honorably and fairly by all our citizens. This will be made more apparent by an extract from the instructions of Secretary Fish to Mr. Cushing, leading counsel for the United States, given on the 8th of December, A. D. 1871, prior to his departure for Geneva. (See papers relating to the treaty, volume 2, page 415:)

"The President desires to have the subject discussed as one between the two Governments; and he directs me to urge upon you strongly to secure, if possible, the award of a sum in gross.

"In the discussion of this question and in the treatment of the entire case, you will be careful not to commit the Government as to the disposition of what may be awarded or what may be recovered in the event of the appointment of the board of assessors mentioned in the tenth article of the treaty. It is possible that there may be duplicate claims for some of the property alleged to have been captured or destroyed, as in the cases of insurers and insured.

"The Government wishes to hold itself free to decide as to the right and claims of insurers upon the termination of the case. If the value of the property captured or destroyed be recovered in the name of the Government the distribution of the amount recovered will be made by this Government without committal as to the mode of distribution. It is expected that all such committal will be avoided in the argument of counsel."

In the face of such instructions, faithfully carried out, not to commit the Government to any mode of distribution, even in case the board of assessors should be convened to pass upon each particular claim in detail, and in face of the declaration that the money should be recovered in the name of the Government so that insurers and others should have no claim upon the fund, it is difficult to see the force of the argument made by insurance companies that the Government holds "their money" received by it "in trust for them." The alleged "trust" was distinctly repudiated before the receipt of the money.

The Government was acting for itself. It desired the award of a gross sum to evade all possible questions. Even if money had been received by our Government without any disclaimer of the alleged "trust" in behalf of certain sufferers, including insurance companies, the Government would not have been an "agent," "attorney," or "trustee" for such parties. It was acting in its sovereign capacity, making and carrying out a treaty, dealing with important general questions as well as private claims. The claimants had no rights which they could successfully prosecute against a foreign power. If they had had, the courts of England were as open to Americans under the petition of right as to English subjects. Their claims were in the hands of Government for prosecution, satisfaction, or abandonment, as the interest of the nation should demand, when the public peace was at stake. Whatever money was received was necessarily received by the Government for all claimants—those supposed to be entitled and those whose claims were sacrificed for the public good. For all were handled by the Government for the general interest, and the claims sacrificed or not pressed, or expressly abandoned, are as much represented in the final award as the claims expressly admitted; for their abandonment may have been a part of the consideration for valuable results actually attained.

A recent case in the English courts will be read with interest in this connection—the case of Rustomjee vs. The Queen, to be found in Law Reports, (1875,) Q. B. division, volume 1, page 487; and the same case, on appeal, in Law Reports, divisions 2 to 5, part 2, February, 1877, page 69. The facts were as follows:

By a treaty between the Queen of England and the Emperor of China, the emperor agreed to pay to the British government the sum of $3,000,000 on account of debts due to British subjects from certain Chinese merchants who had become insolvent, being largely indebted to British merchants. The petitioner, Rustomjee, was the owner of one of the debts covered by the payment; and during the negotiation of the treaty the British agents promised him his claim would be insisted upon, and, when received, paid to him. And the money was paid to the British plenipotentiary to pay the petitioner among others. The petitioner not having received his money, filed his "petition of right" (the ancient common-law remedy for the subject against the Crown), claiming that the queen had received his money as his agent or trustee; and praying that "Her Majesty may be pleased to direct the payment of the said sum to him." This action did not fail because the queen was not subject to judicial proceedings, as a similar case would have failed if brought against the Government of the United States. It failed because it had no merit. Chief-Justice Cockburn, one of the tribunal of arbitration, and fresh from Geneva, said, in his opinion rejecting the petition:

"In such a case a petition of right will not lie. The notion that the queen of this country, in receiving a sum of money in order to do justice to some of her subjects, to whom otherwise injustice would be done, becomes the agent of those subjects, seems to me really too wild a notion to require a single word of observation beyond that of emphatically condemning it. In like manner, to say that the sovereign becomes the "trustee" for subjects on whose behalf money has been received by the Crown, appears to be equally untenable. It comes simply to this, that Her Majesty, in order to enable her to see that injustice is not done to her subjects, stipulates for the payment in her hands of a sum of money. The distribution of that must be left to Her Majesty's discretion."

Justice Blackburn, concurring, said:

"But I do not think that it can possibly be said that when the queen has, as a high act of state, made a treaty and received money in consequence of an act of state, the mode of distributing it is in any way enforceable by a court of law, or subject to the findings of a jury. I think there is a moral claim that it be given to the right person, which must be investigated in the manner in which Her Majesty is pleased to direct, and the ministers who direct it would probably be responsible in Parliament if they did it unjustly."

Mr. Justice Lush said, in the same case:

"Again, if this were treated not as the demand of a debt recoverable at common law, but as a trust, a similar answer would be given, and it is equally valid that no subject can charge the Crown with being a trustee for him. * * * It was received by her in her sovereign character, to be dispensed, as I have said, according to the views of the advisers of the Crown as to the persons entitled and the amounts which should be fair and just as regards the claims of parties."

When this case went to the court of appeals the judgment was affirmed without dissent. In delivering the opinion of the court, Lord Coleridge, chief-justice, used the following language:

"We assent, upon full consideration, to the reasoning of the judges in the court below. The making of peace and the making of war, as they are the undoubted, so they are, perhaps, the highest acts of the prerogative of the Crown. The terms on which peace is made are in the absolute discretion of the sovereign. If Captain Elliott did (to use the words of the petitioner) promise that the queen would compel the Chinese government to pay these claims when terms of peace were arranged; if Sir Henry Pottinger did promise that these claims should be insisted on and should be paid, they both exceeded their authority, and promised what they had no power to perform, or to pledge the queen to perform. The queen might or not, as she thought fit, have made peace at all; she might or not, as she thought fit, have insisted on this money being paid her. * * * We do not say that under no circumstances can the Crown be a trustee; we do not even say that under no circumstances can the Crown be an agent; but it seems clear to us that in all that relates to the making and performance of a treaty with another sovereign the Crown is not, and cannot be, either a trustee or an agent for any subject whatever.

"We do not, indeed, doubt that on the payment of the money by the Emperor of China there was a duty on the part of the English sovereign to administer the money so received according to the stipulations of the treaty, but it was a duty to do justice to her subjects according to the advice of her responsible minister; not the duty of an agent to a principal, or of a trustee to a cestui que trust."

There is a strong parallel between the claim set forth by Rustomjee and that of the insurers. A sum in gross was paid to the United States, as in the case cited, not for the payment of any particular claim or claims, but "for the satisfaction of all the claims referred to the consideration of the tribunal;" and in accordance with the provisions of the treaty the tribunal declared that "all the claims referred to in the treaty as submitted to the tribunal are hereby fully, perfectly, and finally settled." No particular sum of money was found to be due or awarded to any particular claimant at Geneva. No claimant was there having a right to be heard. It was, as Gladstone, prime minister, said in Parliament, "entirely a question between the governments." Hence, when the decision in the Rustomjee case was announced in England, public attention was at once attracted to the parallel, and the London Times said, editorially, in commenting upon it:

"Similar principles in different terms would apply to such an indemnity as we paid to the United States, and it would follow, therefore, that the money was paid to the Government of the United States not in the mere capacity of a trustee for individuals, but as the sovereign authority of the nation. * * * Congress, accordingly, is perfectly within its competence in considering how the surplus shall be appropriated."

And in the very same editorial, commenting upon the claims of insurance companies, it says:

"Where a ship was fully insured, of course the owners received their compensation at the time from the underwriters, and they cannot be paid over again. But the underwriters also received their compensation, for they insured the vessel at war risks, and the additional premium not merely on the particular ship which was lost, but on the numerous other ships insured on the same favorable terms, must be regarded as having secured them against loss. They agreed in fact for the payment of certain premiums to run the risk of the very disaster which happened to any such vessel, and they must therefore be regarded as having insured themselves against the consequences. To pay further compensation to them would in this instance also be paying them twice over."

It is a significant fact in connection with this article that when it first appeared in the newspapers of this country the above remarks as to the claims of insurers were entirely omitted, with nothing to indicate that an omission was made.

In strict accord with the view that the tribunal of arbitration did not and could not pass upon the conflicting titles to the money awarded, the Supreme Court of the United States decided, in the very case relied upon by insurance companies—Comegys vs. Vasse, 1 Peters—(which we will examine more particularly hereafter upon another point,) that the board of commissioners appointed under the treaty with Spain to decide upon the amount and validity of the claims of American citizens had no power to decide finally to whom a claim was really due. The court says:

"They had no authority to compel parties, asserting conflicting interests, to appear and litigate before them, nor to summon witnesses to establish or repel such interests; and, under such circumstances, it cannot be presumed that it was the intention of either government to clothe them with an authority so summary and conclusive, with means so little adapted to the attainment of the ends of substantial justice."

And it is to be noted in this connection that under this treaty the parties appeared in person before the commissioners, urged their claims, and had personal awards in their favor.

The Rustomjee case, in so far as it is an authority in this country, and the opinion of the court in Comegys vs. Vasse, destroy the main proposition of the insurance companies. They persistently argue, as Rustomjee did, that their claims were recognized by the British and American governments; and, as Vasse's assignees did, that a sum of money was awarded to cover their particular claims; and, in the language of Mr. Evarts, that nothing prevents the pursuit of the American Government as their trustee but its general immunity from judicial pursuit. In England that immunity does not exist. The subject is entitled to his petition of right, "where his land, or goods, or money have found their way into the possession of the Crown, and the purpose of the petition is to obtain restitution, or if restitution cannot be given, compensation in money, or where the claim arises out of a contract as for goods supplied to the Crown or to the public service." (See Feather vs. The Queen, 6 B. & S., 294.) And the proceeding of Rustomjee failed because he had no legal or equitable right in or to the money, but was dependent upon the justice and equity of the proper executive authority.

Had the British government paid the United States a sum in gross without the intervention of a tribunal of arbitration, the parallel would have been perfect. Who doubts that the distribution would have been wholly a legislative question? Yet the only object of the tribunal was to ascertain how much Great Britain should pay the United States.

We are therefore decidedly of the opinion that in refusing to recognize the claims of the insurance companies we do not violate any legal or equitable right belonging to them. It destroys no right of property. It does not take advantage of the Government's immunity from judicial pursuit; but puts itself upon the broad ground that it is the duty of Congress to distribute this fund, the distribution of which is not and should not be a merely judicial question. There have been cases where Congress has referred the distribution of a similar fund to the ordinary courts. Under all prior treaties, the treaty itself provided for the reference and payment of private claims. But in these no complicated questions arose. They were chiefly investigations of fact, and it was not necessary to settle in advance the principles of distribution, in order that justice should be done. In the present case, as we have seen, Congress has been uniformly apprehensive that, under a general reference to the courts of law, the real sufferers would be passed by, and the extraordinary spectacle presented of the division of an indemnity fund among persons who had never lost a dollar, but whose pockets had been filled by the very acts out of which it arose.

An investigation of the causes leading to the treaty, of the character of the tribunal of arbitration, and of the reasons controlling it and the action of the two governments appearing before it, both before and during its sittings, will furnish good reason for this opinion. A narrow view of the case, and one that at first view captivates the lawyer, is this: our Government presented certain claims against Great Britain; some were rejected by the court, others were allowed or seemed to be, and all that remains for us to do is to hand over the money we received to the persons whose claims were allowed, or to refer the question to some court to settle. A broader and more correct view would be stated as follows: The tribunal of arbitration was not an ordinary court of law, and did not act on the ordinary principles of jurisprudence. It was created by the treaty. The sole object of its creation was to preserve peace by settling all matters of controversy between two powerful nations. It had no previous code of law by which it could be guided. It was to have no future existence. The treaty which created it laid down the agreed law upon which it should act, the three principles or rules, and the doctrines of international law so far as applicable. These three rules were not adopted because a part of any system of jurisprudence or of international law. They were adopted because arbitration would have been a failure without them. They were insisted upon and agreed to by the United States because of their supposed immense value to us in the future; and by the British government because their application tended to strengthen its case before the tribunal. The Government of the United States had based its claims for damages upon much broader grounds before the treaty was signed. It insisted that the prime cause of all our losses upon the sea was the premature and hasty recognition of the confederate government, which gave it belligerent rights upon the sea before a battle was fought on land, or a ship constructed. It insisted, and with great truth, that the confederate cruisers were built, manned, and equipped in British ports, and that the naval power of the insurgents was solely of British creation and maintenance. And it therefore held Great Britain responsible for all our losses upon sea; for enhanced rates of insurance; for the pursuit of confederate cruisers; and the prolongation of the war. It made no distinction between the Florida and the Georgia, or the Alabama and the Shenandoah.

When it narrowed its claims by the terms of the treaty, it did so in the interest of peace and future advantage—not from conviction of being in the wrong. When it consented before the tribunal to the exclusion of national claims, including the war premiums, the prolongation of the war, and the transfer of our marine to the British flag, it was preserving the existence of the tribunal of arbitration, which was in imminent danger, and sacrificed to the principle of peace the main elements of its case, and gained immense advantage in the rule laid down. And when the tribunal itself rejected from consideration these various national claims, it did so upon no article of the treaty or reasonable principle of international law, but after and in pursuance to a secret agreement of the two governments, necessary to the continuance of the tribunal, that in the interest of peace the tribunal should arbitrarily settle a controversy in which neither side was willing to recede.

Upon what principle of international law could the tribunal of arbitration maintain that damages for the destruction of our commercial marine, the increased cost of the war, and the payment of enhanced premiums of insurance could not be awarded or computed between nations? What becomes of arbitration in the future if this be law? The British counsel made no such argument; insisted upon no such claim. They did insist, however, that these subjects were not within the purview of the treaty, had not been submitted to the tribunal, and were not within its jurisdiction. In all the negotiations between the filing of our case at Geneva, and the agreed rejection of the national or indirect claims alluded to, the British argument was that only private claims had been submitted, and that under the treaty the American Government had waived all claim for national damages. All negotiation for a supplemental treaty failed. Arbitration was upon the very verge of failure. But, by secret agreement between the two nations, the tribunal cut the Gordian knot by ignoring the jurisdictional question raised by England, and a unanimous rejection of the claims as stated.

The truth is, the tribunal was in part a diplomatic court, whose main object was to attain peace by the settlement of all questions pending, and not to determine what individual losers or classes of sufferers should receive indemnity. It awarded indemnity on no fixed principles of justice, and its award furnishes no basis for distribution. The action of the United States in entering into the treaty, or before the tribunal, did not change and was not intended to deny the rights of its citizens in any fund it might receive. When it surrendered previous positions or abandoned classes of claims because of other greater advantages to us as a nation, it was conscious of its power to satisfy these sacrificed claims by the distribution of the fund to the actual losers when that fund came into its possession. If it surrendered valid claims for its own purposes, it has received pay for those claims as much as if they had actually entered into the computation of damages. Peace, the satisfaction of national honor, and supposed valuable principles of action in the future were all gained by our Government in the negotiation of the treaty and the award of the tribunal.

The money awarded belongs as much to these classes as to any other. They assisted in the final result, and if they were not recognized at Geneva they are entitled to recognition at home. The Government recovered the money in its own name for that express purpose. We therefore deny the proposition, insisted upon by insurance companies, that the Geneva fund represents any particular claims or classes of claims. All the "claims referred to the tribunal" were satisfied by the award. It was paid as a gross sum for that purpose. And it is the duty of the legislative power of the Government to ascertain who were actual sufferers for the purpose of indemnifying them for the loss. It should not permit its action at Geneva, in its own general interest, to destroy valid claims. Circumstances did not permit the tribunal to do justice to individuals, but only to adjust questions between nations. Congress must therefore do that justice. Courts cannot do it upon the general principles of law or equity, because the tribunal of arbitration was not guided by them in its preliminary action. It was as much a court of diplomacy as a court of law. To follow its windings would enrich the rich by robbing the poor of an indemnity fund acquired for their benefit. And to throw these claims into any ordinary court of law would prevent the consideration of all the equitable circumstances that should govern in the distribution of an indemnity fund. As Justice Maule very properly said in De Bode's case: "Neither the Queen's Bench nor any other court administers justice in general."

But it is argued that when ships and cargoes were destroyed, upon which insurance was paid, the insurer became vested, upon abandonment, with all the rights of the original owner, including his right to pursue any foreign government, through his own government, to reparation in damages. And numerous decisions upon the doctrine of subrogation have been cited in support of this view. Confidence in this proposition accounts for the zealous support given by insurance men to the bill of the committee proposing a general reference to the Court of Claims. Although the Government of the United States has rarely permitted, in Congress or in the Executive Departments, the application of this technical rule, we acknowledge its correctness in an ordinary suit at law between individuals. But there is a marked distinction between the cases cited and the one under consideration—especially that of Comegys vs. Vasse. All the captures by confederate cruisers were legal. The property was all destroyed. There was no property to recover. No legal right existed against the confederate government; no right of any kind existed against the government of Great Britain. Its ships of war had not committed the wrong; nor had it authorized the seizures or destruction. There was therefore no right to pursue the confederate or British government by the owner of property destroyed. As Chief-Justice Kent said in the Gracie case: "There was no legal redress remaining in contemplation of law, and therefore there was no spes recuperandi existing, or none which could be the subject of liquidation." And in the case of the destruction of our property by English-built confederate cruisers there was no legal redress against the British government, not merely because it was free from judicial pursuit, (which is not true, because Americans can file a petition of right,) but because, its acts or faults being acts of omission, neglect, default, it had committed no wrong to an individual, but it was answerable as a sovereign government only to our sovereign Government for the failure to preserve its neutrality, to take active steps to prevent the damage, which was a duty it owed to us in our national character. When, therefore, by treaty, we provided for the settlement of all these questions and the awarding of damages to us, it was exactly as Mr. Fish contended it should be, and Mr. Gladstone said it was:

"No claims of individuals have been submitted to arbitration in relation to the Alabama. What was submitted to arbitration was entirely a question between two governments."

And it cannot be too often repeated. The nation recovered this money, and the nation should divide it. Under previous treaties, the money was awarded to individuals.

What claim, then, have these insurance companies upon Congress to have their losses reimbursed without the consideration of the greater gains they realized? None whatever in law or in equity. Why should their demand be heard for a reference to the courts, with all the delay incident to protracted litigation? Why should we give them the opportunity to recover their losses in a court of law, with no provision for an account of their gains? The country is under no obligation to them. They assumed war risks voluntarily and as a profitable business. They charged premiums proportionate to the risk. Early in the war they defeated payment of losses under the ordinary marine risk, and the courts held with them that captures by confederate cruisers were not covered by it.

This was their first manifestation of that patriotic fervor to which allusion is here made, only because of the preposterous claim that insurance companies were patriotic in assuming war risks.

They demanded increased rates before assuming any war risk. They demanded premiums which would in their judgment, when added together, more than pay all losses they might sustain. These premiums were at times enormous. But they calculated well. For when the war was over, and the books were balanced, only four companies out of forty-five engaged in the business could show that it had been a losing one. Their net losses reached the small sum of $111,055, while the actual net gains of the remaining forty-one have been estimated at $5,000,000. These net gains they extracted, and much more, from the very war premium men whose claims they are disputing; for, in estimating gains or losses, we have been computing war risks alone. Shall we give this fund to the corporation which, in the language of the London Times, paid itself in advance for all expected losses, and more than realized these losses in heavy war premiums? Shall we give it to all the members of a mutual insurance company, to the exclusion of the particular members of that company who paid the premiums? Shall we divide the fund among the sufferers, or permit the gainers to absorb the bulk of it?

In the matter of insurance of war risks there were two classes, the insurer and the insured. The insurer certainly made money. If he did not, his losses will be reimbursed under this bill. The insured could make no money. His was an outlay for protection against disaster. If he suffered no loss, his premium was an extra and unnecessary expense. If he suffered loss, insurance rarely covered his property to the full extent. The best that could be done by a war-premium payer was to endeavor to add his extra expense to the cost of his goods or to the freight of his ship. We have seen by the statement made by Mr. Cobden that after the cruisers were let loose from England three-fourths of the commerce of New York was carried in foreign bottoms. The importers who imported the remaining fourth in American bottoms could not fix the market price in New York. The importer in foreign bottoms ruled the market. His goods had no war risks added to the prime cost. It was not, therefore, in the power of the shipper in American bottoms to regulate the price of his goods in the market and to include the war premium he was compelled to pay. He was frequently a loser, and even when he realized a net profit upon a particular adventure it would not cover the interest of his investment, the expense of his establishment, and the losses generally incident to his business from the presence of these cruisers upon the high seas. So with the owner of American ships. When he offered his vessel for freight, he was compelled to ask higher rates to cover his heavy insurance. Could he do so when the neutral ships of other nations were in port competing for the same freight? The shipper of goods in a neutral vessel had no war risks to pay upon his goods. He would naturally prefer a neutral ship with the same rate of freight prevailing. Did not the American ship-owner who was too plucky to sell or transfer his vessel suffer heavy damage, not only in the payment of premiums upon his vessel and in the general disturbance and derangement of his business, but frequently by insurance upon the very freight he carried? We know that the American people suffered enormous damage by the confederate cruisers, not only in what was destroyed but in what they accomplished in the destruction of our marine and the overthrow of business. Did insurance companies suffer one particle of this loss? They did not have a ship afloat nor a cargo on the sea. Their business was the receipt of premiums and the payment of losses. Their business was unusually prosperous. But the American merchant shipping in American bottoms, but particularly the owners of American ships trading beyond the coast, did, as a class, suffer heavy and unusual damage. The $15,500,000 paid us by England will not represent a small portion of it. Is it not fair and just, then, that where they can show the payment of extra war risks, paid after the sailing of a confederate cruiser, they should be reimbursed this loss which was caused directly to them by England's conduct in permitting the building, manning, equipping, and sailing of war ships?

The substitute offered by us has provided for the payment of such claims, with the qualification, however, that the court shall "deduct any sum in any way received by or paid to the claimant in diminution of the amount paid for any such premium, so that the actual loss only shall be allowed."

An agent, therefore, who was reimbursed by his foreign principal would not be paid, nor one who received in dividends more than his premiums.

We have also provided for the payment of the losses of all persons by any confederate cruiser, whether exculpated or inculpated, and we do so upon principles heretofore stated in part.

The original claim of our Government upon Great Britain is stated in the following extract from a formal note to Great Britain, dated May 20, 1865, and we cite it in detail, because important in this connection:

"First. That the act of recognition was precipitate and unprecedented.

"Second. That it had the effect of creating these parties belligerents after the recognition instead of merely acknowledging an existing fact.

* * * * * * *

"Fourth. That during the whole course of the struggle in America of nearly four years in duration there has been no appearance of the insurgents as a belligerent on the ocean excepting in the shape of British vessels, constructed, equipped, supplied, manned, and armed in British ports.

* * * * * * *

"Ninth. That the injuries thus received * * * are of so grave a nature as in reason and justice to constitute a valid claim for reparation and indemnification."

Near the close of this note our Government thus sums up the case:

"The nation that recognized a power as a belligerent before it had built a vessel, and became itself the sole source of all the belligerent character it has ever possessed on the ocean, must be regarded as responsible for all the damage that has ensued from that cause to the commerce of a power with which it was under the most sacred of obligations to preserve amity and peace."

The Secretary of State officially wrote, June 13, 1868:

"I have been singularly unfortunate in my correspondence if I have not given it clearly to be understood that a violation of neutrality by the Queen's proclamation, and kindred proceedings of the British government, is regarded as a national wrong and injury to the United States, and that the lowest form of satisfaction for that national injury that the United States could accept would be found in an indemnity, without reservation or compromise, by the British government to those citizens of the United States who had suffered individual injury and damage by the vessels of war unlawfully built, equipped, manned, fitted out, or entertained and protected in the British ports and harbors."

As we have said before, we abandoned this ground only in the interest of peace, and as a basis for the treaty. We established certain rules for the guidance of the tribunal of arbitration. They were arbitrary rules. Under them the tribunal exculpated all but the Alabama, the Florida, and the Shenandoah after Melbourne. But what better claim upon the United States Government has a sufferer by the Alabama than a sufferer by the Georgia or the Shenandoah before Melbourne? The ships were of the same class, register, equipment, ownership—indeed, in every way similar. But as want of diligence, which was one of the elements established by the new rules prescribed in the treaty, could not be shown in the absence of notice by our minister in their cases, they were technically exculpated. And they were so exculpated because Great Britain had not failed to perform her duty as prescribed in said rules. But the duty upon the part of our Government is the same. We are not bound by the exculpation at home. This is an indemnity fund to be distributed according to right and justice, not according to the technical findings of the tribunal. What we waived in the treaty or before the tribunal was waived only for purposes between the two nations; and what was decided by the tribunal settled questions only between the two governments.

In adopting this view we agree with the report of a former committee of this House, from which we copy as follows:

"It will be observed in the case of some of the cruisers, that the arbitrators found Great Britain not liable, for want of sufficient evidence of complicity with that cruiser. The United States, however, are estopped from setting up that there was not sufficient evidence, because they had over and over again declared not only that there was, but that the very act of acknowledging the belligerency of the confederacy itself was the 'cause, and the only cause,' in which this evil had its origin. Besides, having so admitted its own liability and declared the liability of Great Britain upon the ground of the precipitate recognition of belligerency, why did not the Government put its case upon that ground before the tribunal? Clearly because it accepted the 'three rules' instead, for its own future advantage. (Having for its own interest withdrawn from the arbitrators the 'cause and only cause of the evil,' thus leaving the tribunal without evidence of that liability of England which the United States had over and over again, in every diplomatic form, insisted upon, is not the United States estopped from denying reparation to its citizens based upon the finding of a tribunal to which, for its own purposes, it would not submit the evidence? Indeed, by so doing, did not our Government assume this class of losses of its citizens?) Again, it will be observed that the tribunal at Geneva found Great Britain liable for the acts of the Shenandoah after she left Melbourne only; but why is there not the same obligation on the United States to protect the water-borne property of its citizens or repair the injury from the Shenandoah before Melbourne as after, especially when the United States, at the close of the war, claimed the vessel as its own property, sold it as such for a sum very considerably approximating the amount of losses from her capture before Melbourne, and thereby deprived her citizens of any remedy in rem against the offending vessel herself? It was in evidence before your committee that the owner of the ship Delphine was actually taking measures to bring his libel in the British courts against the Shenandoah after she returned to Liverpool for indemnity for the loss sustained in that capture of the Delphine, when the intervention of the United States, claiming the vessel as successor to the confederacy, prevented his bringing suit." (Report of House of Representatives, Forty-third Congress, first session, No. 698, page 7.)

We have also provided in the substitute for interest, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, upon all claims for the loss of property, and have allowed 2 per cent. per annum upon all awards heretofore made under the former law, which permitted only 4 per cent. per annum. We have done so because 6 per cent. has been the lowest prevailing rate for many years in the country where the sufferers have resided.

We have revised the law of 1874 in so far as it provided for damages to whalers for the loss of the vessel and outfit. These vessels carried no freight, but were compelled to employ numerous sailors. They went upon long voyages. The allowance of the value of the vessel and outfit did not, in the judgment of the committee, put them upon an equal footing with merchantmen. The estimates presented by Mr. Stampfli and by Sir Alexander Cockburn contained each an allowance of 25 per cent. upon the value of such vessels. We allude to this as the opinion of intelligent experts of each side upon the proper method of arriving at the fact of the actual loss. We have not adopted the 25 per cent. which Sir Alexander thought too much, but only 10 per cent., with interest thereon from the time the award bore interest. This 10 per cent. is given to those whose claims have been adjudicated as well as those that may hereafter be heard.

We have preferred to refer these cases to a special court, as was done by the previous law, whose expenses should be paid out of the fund itself, and therefore be no tax upon the people. This money has been in the hands of the Government for some time. The claimants are entitled to speedy adjudication, especially when the Government is at no extra expense. This is better than sending them to the Court of Claims, where their litigation would be at the expense of the Government and might interfere with the usual business of that court. As the questions referred by the substitute will be chiefly questions of fact, we have provided no appeal to a higher court. Speedy justice is the object of this omission. The bill proposed by the committee would crowd the Court of Claims, and lay additional burdens upon the Supreme Court of the United States, to which an appeal is allowed, besides harassing the claimants by long and tedious litigation.

[Substitute.]

A bill for reviving and continuing the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That an act approved June 23, 1874, entitled "An act for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain," be, and the same hereby is, revived, re-enacted, and continued; all the provisions thereof to take effect from and after the approval of this act, except as changed or modified by this act.

SEC. 2. That the number of judges for said court shall be three; and the agreement of two of the judges shall be necessary to decide any question arising before said court.

SEC. 3. That the judges of the court hereby re-established shall convene and organize, in the city of Washington, as soon as practicable after their appointment, and the court so organized shall exist eighteen months; and all claims provable under this act shall be verified and filed with the clerk of said court within six months from its organization, or they shall be held to be waived and barred.

SEC. 4. That the first class shall be for claims described in section 11 of said original act not already adjudicated, and for claims directly resulting from damage done on the high seas by confederate cruisers during the late rebellion, including vessels and cargoes attacked and taken on the high seas or pursued by them therefrom, although the loss or damage occurred within four miles of the shore.

In cases of the loss of a whaling-vessel and outfit, the court shall allow, in addition to the compensation provided for in the said original act, the sum of 10 per cent., in lieu of freight, upon the value of said vessel and outfit as found by said court.

And upon all judgments heretofore rendered under said act for the loss of a whaling vessel and outfits there shall be allowed the said sum of 10 per cent. upon the awards as made by the court, with 6 per cent. interest thereon from the day from which said original award bore interest until the date of payment.

The second class shall be for claims for additional interest upon judgments which have been awarded and decreed by the said court of Alabama claims under the said original act; such interest to be computed in each case from the time from which interest was allowed in the original judgments, at the rate of 2 per cent. per annum in addition thereto, to the time of payment, as hereinafter provided.

And upon all judgments to be hereafter rendered upon claims of the first class, as herein described, interest shall be allowed at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, instead of 4, as provided in the original act.

The third class shall be for claims for the payment of premiums for war risks, whether paid to the corporations, agents, or individuals, after the sailing of any confederate cruiser; in determining which it shall be the duty of the court to deduct any sum in any way received by or paid to the claimant in diminution of the amount paid for any such premium, so that the actual loss only shall be allowed.

SEC. 5. That the judgments rendered by said court under this act shall be paid in currency by the Secretary of the Treasury out of the sum of money paid to the United States pursuant to article 7 of the treaty of Washington, and accruing therefrom, not appropriated to claims heretofore proved and allowed under the provisions of said original act and the act extending the time for the filing of claims thereunder.

And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay out of said fund, without further adjudication by any court, the 10 per cent. upon whaling-vessels and their outfit, with interest, as provided in section 5 of this act, upon all awards heretofore made for their loss; and to pay in the same manner the sum of 2 per cent. per annum upon judgments which have been heretofore rendered by said court, to be computed, as provided in section 5 of this act, up to the time of payment; and to enable him to make such payments, the Secretary of State is directed to furnish a certified statement to the Secretary of the Treasury from the files and records of the court in his possession.

SEC. 6. Judgments rendered in the first class shall be first paid, and as soon as entered. Payments shall be made in the second class before judgments in the third class. If the sum of money so unappropriated shall be insufficient to pay the claims of the second class in full, they shall be paid according to the proportions which they severally bear to the whole amount of such unappropriated sum after the payment of judgments in the first class; and the same rule shall be applied in the payment of judgments in the third class.

SEC. 7. No person shall be excluded from the provisions of this act by reason of his being born in any other country than one of the United States if at the time he suffered the loss or damage provided for in this act he was residing in the United States and doing business therein, or was sailing under the protection of the flag of the United States.

SEC. 8. That all claims filed, or that may hereafter be filed, in said court in the name of one or more claimants, relating to a vessel in which other claimants are interested, shall be deemed and held to be legally filed, the same as if all the parties in interest had joined in the filing of the petition.

SEC. 9. That this act shall not be construed as in any way renewing, extending or continuing any of the commissions or appointments of judges or officers of the said court of commissioners of Alabama claims issued and made by virtue of said original act.

SEC. 10. That all moneys necessary for the payment of the salaries of the judges and officers authorized by this act, and for the lawful expenses of the said court hereby re-established, are hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; all of which shall be reimbursed out of the said unappropriated moneys before any of the judgments rendered under this act except the first class shall be paid. And after the reimbursement of all the expenses authorized by this act, and the payment of all the judgments rendered thereunder, if there shall remain any part of the said money, the same shall be and remain a fund from which Congress may hereafter authorize payment of other claims thereon.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York, obtained the floor, and yielded to Mr. HARTRIDGE, who moved the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to adjourn, the Chair desires to refer some executive communications.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. O'NEILL, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, on account of the extreme illness of a near relative.

ENLISTMENT OF MARRIED MEN.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting letter from Colonel John H. King in regard to enlistment and re-enlistment of married men; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN MONTANA TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting correspondence showing the location of the principal portion of the buildings at Missoula, Montana Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EMPLOYÉS IN THE CHICAGO CUSTOM-HOUSE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a list of the names of all persons who have at any time been employed in the custom-house at Chicago, Illinois, since the appointment of William H. Smith as collector; which was referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

EXPENDITURES IN THE QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting report of expenditures in the Quartermaster-General's Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

COMPENSATION TO INFORMERS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a detailed report of all payments made by the Secretary of the Treasury as compensation to informers and seizing officers in cases of frauds against the customs-revenue laws during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

POINT SAN JOSÉ RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the report of the Chief of Engineers on House bills Nos. 5178 and 730, relative to Point San José reservation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL DEPOSITS IN BANKS, ETC.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 4th instant, asking information whether any money belonging to the Treasury of the United States was in the possession and custody of any national or State bank or private banker on the 30th of September and November, 1878, as on deposit or otherwise, other than deposits made by disbursing agents, and to state who held such money, and the amount held by each respectively; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

WILSON'S SURVEYS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting copies of reports of surveys made under direction of Major J. M. Wilson, Corps of Engineers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

HENRY G. CONRAD.

Mr. EDEN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5486) granting a pension to Henry G. Conrad; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JACOB FRY.

Mr. EDEN also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5487) for the relief of Jacob Fry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CENTENNIAL MEMORIAL OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. McMAHON. I am instructed by the Committee of Accounts to report a resolution which was referred to that committee by mistake, and to ask that it be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas in pursuance of the act of Congress approved January 18, 1878, the great seal of the United States has been affixed to the Government centennial memorial entitled "The Administrators of the United States Government at the Beginning of its Second Century," which is now on deposit in the Department of State; and

Whereas the said document is the property of an individual, and is liable to removal at any time: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be directed to incorporate in the sundry civil appropriation bill such sum as may be sufficient to enable the Secretary of State to purchase the said state paper.

The Committee of Accounts was discharged from the further consideration of the resolution, and the same was referred to the Committee on Rules.

POSTAL SAVINGS-BANKS.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 4395) in relation to postal savings-banks be made a special order for next Tuesday, after the reading of the Journal.

Objection was made.

JOSEPH N. LEWIS.

Mr. COLE. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 308) for the relief of Joseph N. Lewis be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. STEELE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion to adjourn.

The question being taken on Mr. HARTRIDGE'S motion, that the House do now adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and three minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BAILEY: The petition of Margaret Kempf, for an increase of pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BALLOU: The petition of the Roseville church, of Newark, New Jersey, for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SCHLEICHER: Twelve petitions of citizens of Uvalde, Corpus Christi, Fulton, Tilden, Lamar, Echo, Goliad, Lagarta, Rio Grande City, Rockport, San Patricio, and Laredo, Texas, for the improvement of Aransas Pass—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. SINGLETON: The petition of the watchmen and messengers of the War Department, that their wages be restored to the figures as they stood before the passage of the last legislative, &c., appropriation bill—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin: The petition of Mrs. D. D. Robertson and 70 other ladies of Waukesha County, Wisconsin, for legislation to punish polygamy—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WILLIS, of New York: The petition of the Friends Temperance Union of the Society of Friends of New York City, for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 12, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in accordance with the requirements of law, a full and complete inventory of the property belonging to the United States in the buildings and grounds occupied by the Department of the Interior; which was ordered to lie upon the table, and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, communicating information in relation to the right of way granted to the Hudson River West Shore Railroad across the public lands of the United States at West Point, New York, under the act of December 14, 1867; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of Louisa Allen, of New York, and the petition of Fannie Daniels, of New York, praying for the passage of the bill pending in the Senate in reference to arrears of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MAXEY presented the petition of W. H. Forrester and others, citizens of Mary Town, Johnson County, Texas, praying for the establishment of a post-route from Cleburne to Mansfield, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of N. A. Kinney and others, of New York, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KELLOGG presented the petition of Peyton R. Mayo, of Louisiana, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BUTLER presented the petition of James Chestnut, of South Carolina, praying for the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DORSEY presented a letter from the managers and officers of the Woman's Christian Association of the District of Columbia, submitting the eighth annual report of the association, and asking further appropriations in aid of the work thereof; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, presented the petition of William Garnett and a large number of others, citizens of Chicago, Illinois, praying for an appropriation for the construction of a canal from the southwest branch of the Chicago River to the mouth of the Calumet River, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of L. K. Tucker and others, citizens of Chicago, Illinois, praying that there may be set aside out of the public lands of the United States a tract of land of not less than one million acres nor more than three millions of acres, for a national charity farm, and giving reasons for the request; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Henry I. Bowditch, M. D., and others, of Boston, Massachusetts, praying for an appropriation by Congress for the printing of the subject catalogue of the national medical library; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FERRY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1477) to designate, classify, and fix the salaries of persons in the railway mail service, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5217) to fix the pay of letter-carriers, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 656) for the relief of A. L. Shotwell, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 550) to authorize the Commissioner of Patents to hear and determine the application of Frederick Cook, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

PUBLIC PRINTING AND BINDING.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1437) relating to public printing and binding, to report it with an amendment and to recommend its passage. As the bill merely concerns the convenience of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, I ask that it be put upon its passage.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Public Printer to print and bind, under the direction of the Committee on Public Printing of either House, any paper or document required by any Senator, Representative, or Delegate, for his own use, on payment of the cost thereof with 10 per cent. of such cost in addition.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Printing was, in line 4, after the word "direction," to insert "and with the approval;" so as to read:

That the Public Printer be, and he hereby is, authorized to print, and bind under the direction and with the approval of the Committee on Public Printing of either House, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1485) to grant a pension to Jacob Nix; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GROVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1486) to adjust the claims of owners of lands within the limits of the Klamath Indian reservation in the State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. TELLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1487) for the disposal of the public lands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of John Whitford. I do this by the request of some reputable attorneys in this city. I know nothing in the world about the merits or demerits of the bill.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1488) for the relief of John Whitford; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KIRKWOOD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1489) granting a pension to John Harlan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MERRIMON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1490) to provide a clerk for the district and circuit courts at Charlotte, in the western district of North Carolina; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. MAXEY and Mr. TELLER submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them to the bill (H. R. No. 5218) to establish post-roads in the several States herein named; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

Mr. MAXEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 5230) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (H. R. No. 5231) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope the Senator from Minnesota, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, will waive that long enough to have the Hot Springs bill, which was reported from the same committee yesterday, disposed of.

Mr. WINDOM. This will take but a very few moments. I think we had better go on with it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to taking up the bill at this time?

Mr. BLAINE. I must object to it, because, coming from the same committee, the other bill has priority.

Mr. WINDOM. I move, then, to take up the fortification appropriation bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Let us understand matters. I do not know that there is any objection to the Hot Springs bill.

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir; I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to proceed to the consideration of the bill which he has named.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 5231) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to state that yesterday, by instruction of the Committee on Appropriations, I reported the Hot Springs bill. I was the organ of the committee. It had priority of the bill which the chairman reports. It is for the Senate of course to decide which bill it will take up, but I humbly suggest to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that it is not for him to displace the order of business from his own committee.

Mr. WINDOM. I merely suggest to the honorable Senator from Maine that I got the floor upon a bill which I had charge of and asked the Senate to proceed to the consideration of it. If the Senate desires to lay aside the fortification appropriation bill, I have no objection to taking up the Hot Springs bill or any other measure.

Mr. BLAINE. I will not of course make a contest with the chairman of my own committee, but I suppose he desired the business of the committee to proceed in the order in which the committee directed it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate has already made its order, and the Secretary will report the bill which is before the Senate.

Mr. WINDOM. Before the bill is read I will state to the Senate that there are two amendments to the fortification bill as reported by the Committee on Appropriations. The bill as it came from the House of Representatives appropriates for the protection, preservation, and repair of fortifications $100,000, and for armaments, tests of cannon, &c., $125,000. The Committee on Appropriations recommend that the first item, to wit, for the protection, preservation, and repair of fortifications and other works of defense, be increased from $100,000 to $200,000. They make this recommendation upon two statements made by the Department. One is, that owing to recent storms serious damages have been done to some of the forts, and that it requires an additional expense to repair them. The second is, that the appropriations were for such fortifications as were not specifically provided for, and as the bill provides specifically for none, the general appropriation for that service is not large enough.

The other amendment is for $125,000 additional for the armament of sea-coast fortifications, &c. The committee, upon very full information from the Department, believe that there ought to be some additional guns of heavier caliber than those that we have; and it is also deemed expedient to order them now, as the guns are needed, in order to prevent a change in the only two establishments where these guns are made, and their conversion to other uses. In case nothing is ordered none of these guns are made. We are informed, and believe the fact to be true, that the only two establishments in the United States where these guns are made will be converted to other uses, and that it will take several years, if they be so converted, for the Government to manufacture any guns of the kind. We therefore made a small increase, amounting to $125,000. These are the only amendments of the Committee on Appropriations to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill, and the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations will be acted upon as they are reached.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment reported from the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 3, before the word "hundred," to strike out "one" and insert "two;" so as to read:

That the sum of $200,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the protection, preservation, and repair of fortifications and other works of defense, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, the same to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment was, in line 15, after the word "guns," to strike out "one hundred and twenty-five" and insert "two hundred and fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

For the armament of sea-coast fortifications, including heavy guns and howitzers for flank defense, carriages, projectiles, fuses, powder, and implements, their trial and proof, and all necessary expenses incident thereto, and for Gatling and other machine guns, $250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 5312) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 5313) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 3547) to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5485) for the relief of Andrew Muckle.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 763) to provide for holding terms of the circuit and district courts in the district of Colorado, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also, in compliance with the request of the Senate of the 13th of June, 1878, returned the bill (S. No. 415) for the relief of Ella Long.

The message further announced that the House had passed a resolution providing for the appointment of a committee consisting of nine Representatives who shall, in connection with a like committee already created by a resolution of the Senate, investigate and report the best method of preventing the introduction and spread of epidemic diseases, especially of yellow fever and cholera, within the limits of the United States, and had appointed as such committee Mr. CASEY YOUNG, of Tennessee; Mr. RANDALL L. GIBSON, of Louisiana; Mr. CHARLES E. HOOKER, of Mississippi; Mr. JOHN GOODE, of Virginia; Mr. JULIAN HARTRIDGE, of Georgia; Mr. LEOPOLD MORSE, of Massachusetts; Mr. JAMES A. GARFIELD, of Ohio; Mr. ALFRED C. HARMER, of Pennsylvania; and Mr. SIMEON B. CHITTENDEN, of New York.

OMISSION IN ENROLLMENT.

Mr. BLAINE. Now I ask for the consideration of the bill which was reported yesterday from the Committee on Appropriations to correct an error of enrollment in the bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BLAINE. Before that motion is put, I desire to say that this bill is a literal transcript of the bill that was passed by Congress at the last session, with two exceptions. The House has inserted a provision that the commissioners shall be nominated to and confirmed by the Senate. They were previously appointed by the President without confirmation. It has also inserted a provision that there shall be a free bath-house for the indigent who visit the springs. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DORSEY] tells me that that was put in last year but left out by mistake. It was not, however, in the enrolled bill. This bill now is a precise transcript with those two exceptions of the act of last session, and the Committee on Appropriations have unanimously instructed me to ask the Senate to pass it.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to inquire what is to be the length of the term of office of these commissioners?

Mr. BLAINE. One year from the date of their appointment. It is limited to one year. As I have stated to the Senate, and state to the honorable Senator now, this is simply a copy. I am not going to argue the merits of the measure because it was quite elaborately considered at the last session of Congress, and it seems now to be rather a matter of good faith to correct that which was wrongfully done in some way not known.

Mr. KERNAN. The terms of the lease, however, are the same as they were in the other bill?

Mr. BLAINE. Indentically. The Committee on Appropriations read it over word by word and letter by letter, and I have stated the only two points of difference in the whole thing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill?

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 5307) to correct an error of enrollment in bill "making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes."

The bill was read at length.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I do not expect to prevent the passage of this bill, and some bill on the subject undoubtedly ought to be passed. I think I was against this scheme at the last session; I am against it yet. I only wish to say in a word why I think it will be found in respect of some of the limitations that are intended to protect the United States against purchasers of lands getting water, that they are so carelessly or so industriously drawn as that water may still be got by the private owners by digging or other means without violating the letter of this proposed act. We all understand that where an act is a limitation upon the rights of a grantee of property, you have got to construe those limitations strictly. If the bill could be properly amended in those respects, I think it would save trouble hereafter. For instance, I notice in the reading it says that the grantees of lands from the United States are prohibited from boring for hot water. That will immediately raise in the courts half a dozen questions of how that can be evaded. A man does not bore, he excavates, he digs with a shovel, he blasts. Then there will be a very interesting question for the courts, such as occurred in respect of a great ceremonial in the Dominion of Canada the other day as to what was a low-necked dress; it will be a great question for the courts as to what is hot water, what degree of Fahrenheit is hot water, and all that sort of thing. The consequence will be, I fear,—and it is due to fair legislation that I state it, as I think so,—that this bill will be found not to be so carefully prepared in respect of the good objects that it has in view as it ought to have been. I hope it will turn out that I am in error.

Then in respect of this lease to a few persons of a hotel for ten years a similar observation might be made. There is no provision in the proposed statute that this lease shall provide for a forfeiture if the rent is not paid or on account of any other violation of the provisions that ordinarily should exist between landlord and tenant. There is an absolute command to make a lease for ten years at such an annual rate. It may be that that would imply and mean a lease with all the usual and ordinary covenants for a forfeiture of the lease for non-payment of rent or for doing any waste or injury to the property. It may be it would not. It is a positive command. It would be very easy to correct it now if Senators are willing, but that would require the bill to go back to the House and so on; so that I only, like most fault-finders, as everybody seems to think it right, put in the prophecy that it will turn out to work some mischiefs that are not now exactly foreseen.

Mr. DORSEY. The provision inserted in this bill to prevent any person buying property at the Hot Springs from boring for hot water, I thought entirely unnecessary in the first instance. The mountain upon which the springs are situated has been reserved in perpetuity to the United States. Nobody can bore upon that mountain or remove that water under the act which we passed two years ago. This measure simply relates to property entirely outside of the reservation of the United States where it is believed by some that possibly by a well six or eight hundred or a thousand feet deep hot water might be reached and brought up. I do not believe that there is a particle of truth in that theory. I do not believe there is any hot water that can be reached there at all. That provision was simply put in to prevent any chance of that sort occurring.

Now in regard to the Arlington Hotel I think if the Senator from Vermont understood the facts in the case he would not object to that legislation. The proprietors of the Arlington Hotel leased the land of Governor Rector, who was supposed at that time to own the property in fee. They erected a building at the cost of $100,000. It was afterward decided that the land belonged to the United States, and Congress passed a law requiring the hot springs and the mountain to be permanently reserved. In making that permanent reservation the commissioners included this hotel upon it. Under the law which required the reservation to be made the commissioners were required to remove every building from the reservation and issue certificates for the payment of the same. If the Arlington Hotel, which is the principal hotel, and a very good one indeed, were removed, it would cost the Government probably $100,000. It would do great injustice to the proprietors of it, and the land from which it would be removed is not worth a penny to anybody; it is a bare rock. It is believed by all concerned, especially by the people of that town and State, that it was a just and proper thing for those men to be permitted to occupy their hotel for ten years by paying a rent of $1,000 a year. The Government does not own the hotel at all; it has no interest in it, but simply owns the ground, and the hotel has been put upon this reservation.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, to so much of this bill as authorizes the reappointment of commissioners to complete the work left incomplete by the previous commissioners I have no objection. I think that portion of the bill ought to pass, and pass promptly, so that the controversies between the Government and the persons owning property outside of the new reservation may be settled at an early day. But to that portion of this bill which authorizes the leasing of the hotel and of existing bath-houses and of additional sites for other bath-houses on the new reservation I do very seriously object. In my opinion it ought to be stricken from this bill, and in my opinion the Congress of the United States will make a very great mistake if they do not strike it from the bill.

In the first place I have to say, Mr. President, that this provision was put on an appropriation bill at the last session as an amendment in the last hours of the session, and I believe on the very last day of the session. It was improper legislation on an appropriation bill at best. It did not undergo the scrutiny that such legislation ought to undergo by committees, and by the Senate and the House too. It is now sought to press this measure through because it is said it passed at the last session, became a law, and was omitted by mistake in enrolling the bill in which it was contained. That point has no force with me, since in my opinion it was not originally proper legislation.

I shall move to strike from this bill that portion authorizing these leases, beginning at the word "and," in line 23, and going to the word "size," in line 45.

Mr. President, in my opinion the waters of these hot springs in Arkansas constitute one of the greatest public properties in this country. They have been known already to possess virtues which cannot be found in any other waters on this continent. I doubt whether you can ever find similar waters on the continent. They are therefore exceedingly valuable for invalids all over the United States, not only of this generation, but of all future generations. They are of inestimable value, in my judgment; and we are legislating upon a subject now in which all invalids living and to live in the future will be directly and personally interested if they choose to avail themselves of the virtues of these springs. Of course I mean invalids afflicted with the peculiar diseases which these waters will cure.

It is all important, therefore, in my judgment, that the waters should be kept perfectly free from encroachment. The Government owns four sections of land, as I understand, amounting to twenty-five hundred and sixty acres. That was the original reservation. By the act of 1877, I think it was, after the decision of the Supreme Court at any rate, a new reservation was laid off by direction of the Government. That new reservation is only two hundred and sixty-five acres, leaving some twenty-two hundred or twenty-three hundred acres to be disposed of by the Government to settlers. Now, within this new reservation of two hundred and sixty-five acres, these waters are found. There are seventy-one springs, as I understand, along the foot of the Hot Springs Mountain, on this new reservation of two hundred and sixty-five acres. If you allow buildings to be constructed or continued upon that reservation for any length of time, you will certainly endanger the purity of those waters. For instance, the Arlington Hotel is built over, as I understand, three of these springs.

Mr. DORSEY. The Senator is entirely in error in that. The Arlington Hotel is not built over any spring nor very near any spring. There is not a spring within fifty feet of it.

Mr. HILL. Very well; it is not material. I will simply say that my information is that it is built over three; over two directly, and one immediately in front.

Mr. DORSEY. The Senator has been wrongly informed.

Mr. HILL. My information may be incorrect. Of course the Senator from Arkansas knows more than I do about it, and I will yield to him on that point of information. It is not very material, however; I was only offering it as an illustration.

I understand, furthermore, that the large iron bath-house is built over the largest of these springs. Is that right or wrong?

Mr. DORSEY. The large bath-house to which the Senator alludes is built partly over one of the springs, but the water is all carried out beyond the bath-house and used for other bath-houses just the same as if this one was not there.

Mr. HILL. Yes; but it is built over the spring.

Mr. DORSEY. Not exactly.

Mr. HILL. Ah, well, "not exactly," but partially.

Mr. DORSEY. Well, Mr. President, the Senator will allow me——

Mr. HILL. I only want the facts correctly.

Mr. DORSEY. Under this bill the Secretary of the Interior has the power to regulate the place of building, the character of the building, and everything in relation to it; and I presume, if he is the man he ought to be, he will not allow any bath-house to be built over a spring.

Mr. HILL. That has nothing to do with the question. I say that the iron bath-house already built, not a bath-house to be ordered to be built by the Secretary of the Interior, but the large bath-house already built, is built over the largest of these springs. I am informed, moreover, that the spring upon which this bath-house is built furnishes about one-fourth of the entire water of all the seventy-one springs of that place.

Now, Senators will perceive that if bath-houses are allowed to be built over these springs either in whole or partially, as the gentleman concedes one is built partly over a spring, the slum from the bath-house entering into that spring will destroy the water.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Georgia will allow me, I will say that I think he is laboring under a slight mistake in relation to the facts in reference to the iron bath-house. The fact is that the iron-bath house is not built over any of the springs, but in cutting out the foundations for building the bath-house a stream, one of the largest and perhaps one of the hottest at the Hot Springs, was developed, the stream gushing from the wall created by the cutting out; and the waters from it are conducted into the iron bath-house, and by pipes to other bath-houses below. That, I think, is the exact fact in regard to the location of the bath-house, so far as it is near the spring.

Mr. HILL. That is, that bath-house controls that spring. That was the only fact I cared for as material. It is not right for one bath-house to control the largest spring on that reservation. That spring, as I understand it, gives out between one-fourth and one-third of all the water of the reservation—over one-fourth of all the water furnished by the seventy-one springs—so that this spring is equal to nearly twenty ordinary springs. This spring, my friend the Senator from Tennessee admits, is controlled by this one bath-house. I submit to the Senate that is not proper. That is not leaving these springs free. But I only instance this for illustration. It is not very material to the purpose of my argument whether that spring is controlled by the one bath-house or whether that bath-house is built over the spring.

Mr. DORSEY. Will the Senator allow me a moment? The Senator is entirely in error in stating that that one spring, or that any spring, is controlled by any one bath-house. The spring to which he alludes has been built up by the owners so that it flows nearly over the top of the bath-house, and the bath-house next to it; the one named by the Senator is only allowed to have water enough for its forty tubs, and not a drop more. The rest goes to other bath-houses.

Mr. HILL. It seems almost impossible for me to get the facts right; but the Senate will excuse me when the gentlemen who advocate the bill do not themselves agree. I have stated the fact precisely as admitted by my friend from Tennessee, who was questioning my statement, and attempted to correct me.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg the Senator from Georgia to allow me to say that I am not to be understood by him as advocating the passage of the bill. I shall vote with the Senator from Georgia for the amendment he suggests, but I desired that the Senator from Georgia should understand the fact exactly as it was. The Senator from Georgia did not understand my statement if he understood me to assert that that bath-house controlled absolutely that spring, because my statement was that the water was conducted from that spring into the bath-house and portions of the water conducted from that spring by pipes to other bath-houses.

Mr. HILL. And after my friend had stated that, I asked him the question if that spring was not controlled by that one bath-house, and I certainly understood him to say yes.

Mr. HARRIS. To the extent that it is supplied by it.

Mr. HILL. To be sure.

Mr. HARRIS. And the statement was distinctly made, that water was conducted from that spring by pipes to other bath-houses.

Mr. HILL. To be sure, by the consent of the owners of that bath-house.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not know about that.

Mr. HILL. That is the way I understood it; but I certainly understood the Senator to concede the fact that that spring, furnishing between one-third and one-fourth, as I am informed, of all the water there, is controlled by that one bath-house. But let this be as it may, in my judgment there ought not to be any building at all on this new reservation that will interfere with the free use of all these springs by the people of the United States.

Mr. MERRIMON. What is the quantity of water?

Mr. HILL. That I do not know.

Mr. INGALLS. The daily discharge is about five hundred thousand gallons.

Mr. HILL. I believe I have heard that the daily discharge is about five hundred thousand gallons, and the daily discharge of this one spring to which I allude is from one hundred and twenty-five thousand to one hundred and forty thousand gallons, being over one-fourth of the whole. Now they have got a large bath-house built which as I understand entirely controls this spring, but certainly largely controls it by the admission on all hands. And that bath-house, I am informed again—and I do not know that my information is correct, for it seems that I have so much incorrect information on this subject that I shall be glad to stand corrected in the details—I am informed that that large iron bath-house has been built upon this reservation since the decision of the Supreme Court declaring this to be the property of the United States. I desire to know if that fact is true.

Mr. DORSEY. I believe that to be true, but it was built under the authority of the Court of Claims, who had a receiver there in charge of the property. He rented the land to the parties who built on it, some people from abroad, somewhere, I do not know who they were, and they paid a large revenue. I think now that bath-house is paying $5,000 a year tax.

While I am on my feet, if the Senator from Georgia will allow me a single word, I wish to remark, that under this bill no bath-house on that reservation anywhere, this one or any other one, can ever receive more than water enough for forty bath-tubs. They cannot control any spring.

Mr. HILL. Now, Mr. President, I am told that it is true that this large bath-house was built on this reservation since the decision by the Supreme Court declaring that this property was the property of the United States. The Senator says it was built by authority of the Court of Claims; I presume by direction of the receiver appointed by the Court of Claims. That, doubtless, is true. What authority the Court of Claims or the receiver appointed by the Court of Claims had to lease the property of the United States in the reservation, I do not precisely comprehend.

Mr. DORSEY. If the Senator will turn to the act of 1870, the second section, and read the provision which I will find in a moment, he will see what authority the Court of Claims had to lease this land. He will see in that act it was a mandatory provision that it should be leased forthwith as soon as it was decided, if it was decided to belong to the Government.

Mr. HILL. The idea of leasing property temporarily is one thing; but to deduce from it authority for the construction of an immense iron bath-house, which I understand the friends of the proprietor claim cost him $20,000 or $30,000, is a monstrous proposition. That land might have been leased temporarily——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired, and the Senate resumes the consideration of its unfinished business.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope this bill will be indulged for a few moments.

Mr. GARLAND. I ask the Senator from Vermont, who has charge of the bill which is the unfinished business, to allow this to be disposed of.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it will not take more than five minutes I will yield to it; but I think the electoral bill is a question of quite as much importance as this. I will not object to its being laid aside informally for five minutes if that time is required.

Mr. BECK. I hope the Senator from Vermont will give us thirty minutes. We can pass the bill in that time, but if not, we can lay it aside.

Mr. HILL. I will say that in my judgment a bill of this character ought not to be hurried through.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not hear the Senator from Kentucky.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He asks for thirty minutes for this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is asking a good deal. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] gave notice the other day that he desired to submit some remarks to-day at one o'clock upon a bill of great interest to his section of the country,—the levee bill, I believe. It has been the universal courtesy of the Senate to grant requests of that kind except in some very extreme emergency indeed, and I do not feel at liberty to interpose any objection to his being heard under such circumstances. The consequence will be that the day will be lost and consumed without this important bill being acted upon. If there can be an understanding that we shall vote on the electoral bill to-morrow before an adjournment, and dispose of it one way or the other, then I will not object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate consent that the final vote on the electoral bill shall be taken to-morrow. [A pause.] To this the Chair hears no objection. The order will be entered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I assent to the thirty minutes desired, if the Senator from Louisiana is willing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana assent to this arrangement?

Mr. EUSTIS nodded acquiescence.

Mr. BAYARD. I had supposed that to-day under the notice given by the honorable Senator from Vermont, the bill touching the count of the electoral votes was to be the unfinished business, and that it would be disposed of to-day. I understood him to say that he intended to ask the Senate to "sit it out." My convenience in this matter has been already considered by the Senate, and I do not know that any remarks I may have to make are of special force. At the same time I do propose before the vote is taken to give my reasons for a somewhat hesitating support to the bill. I prefer to do so now. At the same time if the Hot Springs bill can be disposed of in the course of half an hour, I shall have no objection whatever to letting it get through.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I had certainly no disposition whatever to interfere with the plans of the Senator from Delaware—quite the reverse, as I expressed yesterday. My only suggestion about having it understood if we could not finish the electoral bill to-day that it should certainly be finished to-morrow, was in the interest of gentlemen who wish to finish the Hot Springs bill in thirty minutes. The Senator from Louisiana, several days ago, as a matter of personal courtesy to himself gave notice that he desired to be heard in respect to the levees to-day at one o'clock, and yielding to that courtesy which has always prevailed in such respects where a Senator has given notice of a set speech, as it may be called, upon a particular topic, and without calling to mind or supposing that the Senator from Delaware desired to speak at any particular moment to-day, I made the suggestion. Certainly if it interferes with him at all I must withdraw it of course.

Mr. BAYARD. Our business is fortunately so conducted that there is a spirit, I am sure, of personal courtesy in the Senate, and a desire generally to facilitate business. I am aware that if you press off the discussion of a matter of business such as this Hot Springs affair is, it may become possibly very protracted. If this thing can be decided in the course of half an hour or so, I have no desire to interfere with the debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand the Senator from Louisiana will only wish to occupy about an hour, which still ought to leave us a couple of hours at least for the electoral bill this afternoon, after the Senator from Louisiana shall have concluded.

Mr. BAYARD. I confess I would rather not postpone what I have to say on the electoral bill to two hours from now; but if gentlemen can finish the Hot Springs bill in half an hour, I shall give way.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire with the leave of the Senate to make this remark, that in considering the Hot Springs bill the Committee on Appropriations did not take into consideration and did not deem themselves at liberty to take into consideration the merits of the bill at all. It had been enacted by Congress; it had been in some way fraudulently prevented from final enrollment; and the committee thought, and I certainly think, that the Senate could set no worse example than, if a piece of legislation fully perfected by the consent of both branches of Congress knowingly after discussion shall be stolen midway between the two branches, to allow the thief to get the privilege of a new hearing and a new trial with all the possibilities in his favor. If I were opposed to this bill, every line of it, if I had voted against it, I should certainly think that the good faith of the two branches and the purity of legislation hereafter required that we should re-enact what the two branches did enact after full knowledge and full discussion.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, that is the very point I make. This clause was not enacted after full consideration and debate.

Mr. BLAINE. This very point was discussed two or three hours in this very Chamber.

Mr. HILL. This very point of allowing these buildings on the new reservation was provided for by an amendment to an appropriation bill, which is inconsistent with proper legislation.

Mr. BLAINE. Still the Senator from Georgia does not deny that on that amendment to the appropriation bill there was discussion in this Chamber.

Mr. HILL. Oh, not at all. Certainly there was some discussion, but I say, sir, we have a provision that legislation of this kind ought not to be put on appropriation bills, because it cannot receive due consideration.

Mr. BLAINE. That of course was a good objection at the time; but the Senate ordered that it should go on.

Mr. HILL. I understand that, quite as well as the Senator from Maine does, as I was present when the amendment was offered, and I stated at the time, as the RECORD will bear me out, that I did not believe that amendment ought to pass; but I was not sufficiently acquainted with the facts to give reasons for my opinion. The Senator from Kentucky on my right, [Mr. BECK,] a member of the Committee on Appropriations, stated frankly to the Senate that so far as he knew the amendment was proper, but he confessed at the time that he did not fully understand it. As vigilant and as earnest as he is, and having been a member of the committee himself, he did himself the justice and the Senate the justice to get up and state that he did not understand the facts, and that while it seemed to be right he did not know whether it was or not.

Now, sir, in the face of these facts I say it cannot be stated that this amendment received full and proper consideration when offered to an appropriation bill in the last days of the session and was hurried through as it was, and here now no two gentlemen can agree upon the real facts of the case. For that very reason I say the Senate ought not to allow this bill to pass in this way. It ought to receive fuller and fairer consideration. I do not believe it is proper in itself.

A friend before me very kindly admonishes me from his seat to be certain of my facts before I make statements. I say very frankly so far as the details of the facts are concerned, as I said to the Senate in the beginning, they are not at all material to this question. I may be misinformed as to certain details of the facts. The truth is that no man in this Senate Chamber seems to understand the facts; no committee has investigated them. The Senator from Maine himself says that the Committee on Appropriations did not investigate the merits of this question; and the Senate is asked to hurry through a second time very material legislation involving one of the most valuable properties of the United States, without any due consideration at all as I insist. It never has been duly and properly considered. We ought to take time. Strike out this clause from the bill and I will agree to it; strike out this provision from the bill, and it is right enough; and then if it is proper to lease these waters and lease these buildings, bring up a regular bill authorizing the lease; let that bill go before the Committee on Public Lands or some other committee, and let it be properly investigated, and let the Senate fully understand it, and then the suggestions made by the Senator from Vermont will come in very properly. In a bill properly prepared to authorize the leasing of this property, all those provisions can be made. But to thrust in a general promiscuous provision in an appropriation bill to authorize leases of property is not proper legislation and not becoming the Senate. If it is a proper thing to be done, let it be done by a regular bill.

Now, one more remark. I alluded to these particular facts as to one building covering a certain spring, as to its having been put there since the Supreme Court decided it to be the property of the United States, not for the purpose of assailing the title of the owner of the building, or rather his equity in it, or the equity of anybody else, but to show you how dangerous it is to allow private individuals to erect buildings on this public property. They will take advantage, they will make large expenditures and then come in and plead an equity.

Mr. DORSEY. Will the Senator allow me? The act approved June 14, 1870, section 2, contains this provision——

Mr. HILL. I have just said that that is wholly immaterial.

Mr. DORSEY. I think it is very material because the Senator has made the point over and over again that the particular bath-house to which he alludes was put on this reservation without authority; that somebody had been leasing property of the United States unlawfully. Let us see.

Mr. HILL. I made no such point. I distinctly stated—the Senator certainly did not hear my last remark or he would not consume my time——

Mr. DORSEY. Will the Senator allow me to read the law on this subject?

Mr. HILL. I said that I made no issue on the right of the holder of that property under that lease, but I do say that an authority to lease by a court and through the receiver of a court is measured by the extent of that authority and can go no further. It is not intended to be a permanent thing. But that is wholly immaterial. The point I make is this: under that authority to which the Senator refers, and through the Court of Claims and through the receiver appointed by the Court of Claims, you see what a building was put up there, and now great equities are claimed in behalf of the holder of that temporary property to extend the lease and enlarge the time.

Mr. President, the only point I make, and the only material point in the case, is this: whatever may be the details of the facts, here is a great public property, a property that cannot be duplicated upon this continent. It is our duty as trustees for the whole people to preserve this property from the possibility of injury; and the best way to do that, in my opinion, is to exclude the erection of private buildings upon it. Let this reservation of two hundred and sixty-five acres be perfectly free. Give no man in the United States a privilege upon it that is not allowed to any other citizen of the United States. Allow them, if you please, to take their bath-houses off the reservation, and then the whole country can have as many bath-houses as the people want. At least, I believe that this matter is of such importance that we ought to take time to consider it; and if my amendment be carried and this provision stricken out, a bill can be introduced on the subject of authorizing leases that will be guarded, as the Senator from Vermont has well said, so that all interests may be secured and the Senate can legislate with intelligence and knowledge of what they are doing.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, the questions before the Senate coming up under this bill are very few, and in my judgment very simple. I was not here at the period of the last session when the bill which has been referred to was passed, and as to what transpired in this Chamber at the time I was not informed save by the record of the proceedings of this body; but of one thing I am informed, that with the exception of two items pointed out by the Senator from Maine who has this bill in charge this is the very identical bill that was passed in the last hours of the session in June last, and the question now presented to the Senate simply is this: shall the bill that they passed at that time stand as a part of the legislation of that session?

Mr. GORDON. What are the provisions in this bill which were not in the act passed last summer?

Mr. GARLAND. I shall come to that point presently. The House of Representatives has promptly said that the legislation as it was enacted must stand. It comes to the Senate now for its action, and we pause and hesitate upon it instead of declaring at once that the legislation we then enacted shall be the legislation of that session.

Now, I will go as far as the Senator from Georgia or any other Senator in reprobating the system that has grown up of incorporating and putting in the center of an appropriation bill general legislation. That is an evil which never will receive any sanction at my hands. But it is a little too late in the day for the Senator from Georgia to make a point upon that now, when we recollect that that important feature of the statutes of the United States which relates to the competency of witnesses stands in thirteenth volume of the Statutes at Large in the very center of the body of an appropriation act. As the Senator from Maine has said in response to the Senator from Georgia, it was a good time to make that objection when the bill was before the Senate in June last, but it is too late now. The Senator must meet the question broadly and squarely, "is this an act of the Congress of the United States?" If to-morrow he or any other Senator should propose a bill to repeal it, that would be another and a different question; but the question now for practical men of the constitutional age to hold seats in this body is simply, shall we say that what we enacted in June last shall be recorded as our legislation? We simply ask, as we say in a court of justice, to make the record speak the truth. Now, will the Senator say that must be done, or will he say that it shall not be done? He does not deny, nor does any other Senator deny, that such is the truth of the record. The question is, shall it be so stated?

The Senator from Georgia has taken up some little time in stating facts to the Senate, and then says very emphatically that those facts are immaterial to this question. In that I fully and heartily concur with him, because, mark you, at the close of his remarks the leading point with him is to protect the indigent and the poor people, that they may have the use of this hot water. In that I fully concur; and if the Senator had read the bill, which I fear he never has, he would have found a full and complete protection for all that class of people. There is a clause which gives every benefit to the claims for the free use of the water by indigent and poor people. The last proviso is:

And provided further, That the superintendent shall provide and maintain a sufficient number of free baths for the use of the indigent, and the expense thereof shall be defrayed out of the rentals hereinbefore provided for.

No one of the big iron bath-houses or the little iron bath-house or any other bath-house can procure a lease so as to infringe upon this right. That is guaranteed to these indigent and afflicted people as amply and as completely, I think, as the Senator from Georgia could draft a bill to do it if he undertook the job. So, why has the Senator been talking about a certain bath-house covering one spring, and what difference does it make whether the water it uses comes from the regular, ancient spring, or whether it gushes from the earth at a point before unseen by human eye? That is nothing to the purpose. There is protection now, Mr. President, for the indigent and afflicted people. That is what the Senator from Georgia wants and all he wants. The proviso I have read covers and protects the previous power to lease given in this bill.

Mr. HILL. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that I see that clause in the part of the bill relating to leases, all of which I think ought to be in a separate bill. I will therefore modify my motion so as to strike out from the word "and," in the twenty-third line, down to the word "for," at the end of line 49, so as to leave this last proviso to be provided for with the rest in a proper bill for that purpose.

Mr. GARLAND. The wonderful inconsistency between the gentleman's remarks when he was first on the floor and this present motion I leave him to reconcile as best he may.

Mr. HILL. In my remarks before I said not one word about the indigent.

Mr. GARLAND. I beg your pardon. I am not deaf nor blind.

Mr. HILL. The RECORD will show. There was not a single allusion to them.

Mr. GARLAND. Then if the Senator made no reference to the indigent and the poor, he did say that this should be left free to everybody. This proviso is ample for that purpose; and what more does the Senator want? He seems to be hard to accommodate this morning.

Now as to the question of leasing, let us look at that for a moment. It is known to the Senate that the question of the title to Hot Springs has been in the courts and before the Land Department for over thirty years from first to last, the Government holding all the time the fee, never having issued the patent to anybody. Finally in June, 1870, Congress passed the statute to which my colleague called attention a few moments ago, placing this litigation in the Court of Claims and compelling the parties to go there and litigate with the United States the right to this property. In that they made provision for a receiver to be appointed by the Court of Claims in case the property should be adjudged to the United States, and for that receiver to make these different leases and others named in that act; many of which the receiver did make, the one alluded to by my colleague particularly and others that this bill is intended to cover. Whether his power to lease was a narrow or a broad power, he made the leases under the direction of the Court of Claims acting by and under the authority of the act of Congress; and shall it be said that the parties to whom the leases were made have no rights in equity, that they should not be considered in adjusting these matters? The thing is almost monstrous in my mind.

Mr. President, at last this is but a temporary provision to enable these parties to have their titles adjudicated there whether they be based in law or in equity; and when that is settled the Senator from Georgia may bring in any bill he pleases. The business cannot last over a year longer if these commissioners are continued. Then the Senator may bring forward any bill he pleases in reference to leases in reference to reservations. I am committed to none. I am as free and independent as to my action toward that property after the rights of my constituents there are determined as if the property were in Pensacola or in Brooklyn, and I shall give every proposition from the Senator from Georgia, or other Senators, a full and fair and frank consideration whenever it is brought forth with this view.

Now, what is the state of the case under the existing facts? Lease have been made under color of law and the question is, shall we ignore them and trample them under foot? I do not think the Senate is prepared to do it.

The Senator from Vermont has spoken of the absence from this bill of safeguards upon the leases. Why, sir, it is never necessary to enact the whole law of landlord and tenant in providing for the leasing of property. That is well understood in the common mind of the country, and well understood in the courts of justice. The bill would be interminable, there would be no end to it, if we attempted to set forth with distinctness all the provisions and safeguards which are understood and expressed clearly in the law as to landlord and tenant.

Now, in response to the question of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] as to the two provisions which are added to this bill——

Mr. BECK. That is not necessary. I have explained those provisions to the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON,] and he is satisfied.

Mr. GORDON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARLAND. Very well, then I will not go into that; but I desire to say a very few words more.

There is great necessity for the enactment of this bill. If there should be any difficulties or troubles arising under it, they may be remedied after a while when these commissioners shall report what titles they have adjudicated and what not, and report the true and exact condition of the reservation. Then it will be time enough to consider them. Now, it is almost a land without law there. It is time that Congress was doing something. The various propositions for the Government to build hotels, to lease bath-houses and allow saloons and lay off walking grounds, &c., can come up at the proper time. So far as I represent the State of Arkansas, I am committed to none of them, as I said before.

I hope the Senate will enact this bill and I will go with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] or any other Senator at any time to correct any abuse there may arise or may be found to exist.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I only desire to say that the Committee on Appropriations considered the single question whether the integrity of the records of Congress should be maintained. The House of Representatives with great unanimity have passed this bill declaring that they should be; and it is for Senators to say whether they will open a discussion and go at large into the merits of all the questions in this case, or whether they will agree with the House of Representatives in saying that the records of the last session of Congress at which this bill was passed just as it is now, with the exception of two words added by the House, which may be stricken out or not as the Senate please, shall be preserved, in short—whether the Senate will agree with them in maintaining the integrity of the records of Congress.

We do not know whether this provision of the sundry civil bill was left out by accident or design; therefore I assume that it was by accident—it may have been by design—but whichever it was the laws as now published do not show the truth as to the action taken at the last session of this Congress relative to this matter. It is entirely immaterial, as the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] now suggests, whether it was an accident or not; but I am willing, as I said, to assume that it was an accident for all the purposes of my argument. I assert that no instance can be found in the history of the legislation of this country where Senators have refused to make the records show the truth of the action taken by Congress. It is offering a bonus to fraud; it is offering a premium to thieves to follow our conference committees and to follow our enrolling clerks all over the Capitol, after a bitter controversy has been had, so as to steal such parts of the record as they do not like and strike out such laws as they cannot defeat in honest debate, and then Senators rise here in their places and seek to renew that debate after the law has been thus stolen. I ask any Senator is he prepared to give a vote like that?

The Senate Committee on Appropriations said "this law may be a good one or it may be a bad one; it may be a law that we will repeal to-morrow morning if the Senator from Georgia will bring in a bill seeking for the repeal of the obnoxious portions of it and give us good reasons showing why it should be repealed; but we will not allow the records of this Congress to be tampered with; we will not allow any design, any accident, or anything wrong, to interfere with the truth of what we have heretofore done." I care not whether it was fully debated at the last session or not; I care not whether it came up in a proper bill or not; the Senator from Georgia was here and made his objections then; other Senators made their objections. I do not say that everything in this bill is right; but I say everything in this bill was the act of the Congress of the United States, the committee of the Senate of the United States compared it, as the Senator from Maine said, word by word, letter by letter, and took nothing from and added nothing to it, but gave notice to all the world that that act of Congress could not be falsified and that nobody hereafter should be encouraged or induced to follow conference committees or enrolling clerks and seek to steal what he may not like and then get honorable Senators to indorse the fraud by leaving it out of the records or laws of the country.

That is the view we took of it. I stand there and maintain that law in its integrity. I care nothing whether the provision is good or whether the law is good. I say I will vote to-morrow to repeal every clause in it if the Senator from Georgia or any other Senator will show that it ought to be repealed or that any portion of it ought to be repealed.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Does he say that this portion of the enrolled bill was stolen?

Mr. BECK. I said it was lost by accident or design, and I assume that it was by accident. I want the Senator from Georgia to understand me. I charge nothing on anybody; but it might have been stolen, and if it had been stolen, would the Senator from Georgia refuse to restore it? I ask that question.

Mr. HILL. Certainly not.

Mr. BECK. Then if it was lost by accident why not restore it as well as if it was stolen?

Mr. HILL. I will ask the Senator a question, and I rose to ask him that question, and I do not propose that he shall pervert my question by asking me one before I can get mine out. Assume that this was lost by accident from the conference room or the Clerk's office, if this portion of the measure is wrong in itself, if it is not proper legislation in itself, if it is not wise legislation, will the Senator insist that it ought to be re-enacted simply because it was once inconsiderately enacted? That is the point. If that be the ground, if it is to be re-enacted simply because it was once enacted, although inconsiderately and unwisely enacted, I admit that my motion was wrong. I have taken the ground that it ought not to have been enacted at all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The time limited for this bill has passed. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. EUSTIS.]

Mr. BLAINE. If there be no objection let us have a vote. The Senator from Louisiana I am sure will agree to that.

Mr. BECK. I will withhold all remarks to get a vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be continued before the Senate if there be no objection. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] to strike out from line 23 to line 49 the words which will be read.

The SECRETARY. The proposed amendment is after the word "act," in line 23, to strike out the following words:

And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to lease to the present proprietors of the Arlington Hotel or their assigns the grounds, not exceeding one acre, now occupied by them, for a period of ten years, unless otherwise provided by law, at an annual rental of $1,000. And he is further directed to lease the bath-houses of a permanent nature now upon the Hot Springs reservation to the owners of the same, and lease to any person or persons, upon such terms as may be agreed on, sites for the building of other bath-houses for the term of five years, unless otherwise provided by law, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe; and the tax imposed shall not exceed $15 per tub per annum, including land rent: Provided, That said leases shall in no way prejudice any legal right that any person or persons may have acquired under the act hereby revived and continued, to any improvements on said ground: And provided further, That to prevent monopoly, no bath-house or hotel shall be supplied with more than enough water for forty bath-tubs of the usual size, unless there shall be more than enough hot water to supply all other demands for the same, in which case no single establishment shall be allowed more than forty bath-tubs of the usual size: And provided further, That the superintendent shall provide and maintain a sufficient number of free baths for the use of the indigent, and the expense thereof shall be defrayed out of the rentals hereinbefore provided for.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia moves to strike out of the bill the matter just read. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELLA LONG.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Before the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] is recognized, the Chair will lay before the Senate the bill (S. No. 415) for the relief of Ella Long, returned by the House of Representatives, by request, on which a motion to reconsider was entered on the 13th of June last by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD.] It will lie on the table for the present.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

A bill (H. R. No. 5312) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5313) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The bill (H. R. No. 3547) to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 5485) for the relief of Andrew Muckle was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COURTS IN COLORADO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 763) to provide for holding terms of the circuit and district courts in the district of Colorado.

The Secretary proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Has that been to the Judiciary Committee?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment has not been. It has just come from the House of Representatives.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then it ought to go to the committee.

Mr. TELLER. I will say that this bill is a Senate bill returned with an amendment by the House of Representatives. It is a local bill, and is satisfactory both to the Member and to the Senators. It is a matter purely of local concern, and I should like very much to have the Senate concur in the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I know nothing of the character of the bill, but I am opposed to bills coming from the House being acted upon immediately on their reception here. No Senator can know what they mean. The amendment is long enough for a bill; it has not been to a committee, and it certainly in my judgment ought to go there. I have no doubt it is right if the Senator says so, but one day's delay can make no difference, and it ought to go to the proper committee, in my judgment.

Mr. TELLER. The trouble is that if it goes to the Judiciary Committee it is very apt to remain there in the press of business under which they are laboring. It is a very important bill for us. A portion of the country is far distant from the place where the courts are now held. It seems to me the Senate might concur, and ought to concur, in the amendment without risking the defeat of the bill which they do risk by sending it to the committee. I should like to have the Senator from West Virginia withdraw his objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. When the reading of the amendment shall have been completed the motion to refer it will be in order; but the time of the Senate need not be spent in reading the amendment throughout if the Senator insists on the motion to refer.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I was going to suggest that the amendment has not been printed. No Senator can know what it is without seeing it. I hope the Senator from Colorado will not insist on its passing to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator to move the reference of the amendment?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I want it to take its regular course and go to the committee. I believe that is best.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is moved that the bill be referred, with the amendment of the House, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had this day approved and signed an act (S. No. 824) establishing the rank of the senior inspector-general, and an act (S. No. 1133) for the relief of William Gibson.

LEVEES OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will now recognize the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] who gave notice of his intention to submit some remarks to-day on the bill (S. No. 1436) appropriating money for constructing, rebuilding, and repairing levees on the Mississippi River in the States of Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana. That bill having been read twice is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, the question which is presented by the bill I have introduced is whether money should be appropriated out of the Federal Treasury for the purpose of building the levees on the Mississippi River. I am aware that this measure has been urged on various grounds. It has been said, for instance, that inasmuch as many of these levees had been destroyed by the armies of the United States during military operations, therefore the Government of the United States, as an act of justice, should rebuild the levees. It has also been urged that the great benefits which are to accrue to the Government by the reclamation of these overflowed lands constitute a sufficient reason why the Government of the United States should build these levees.

While I do not discard these considerations or any others, they do not constitute the position which I take upon this important question. I maintain that the Government of the United States has a sufficient proprietary right and control and jurisdictional authority over this river to impose upon the Government of the United States the ordinary obligations, responsibilities, and duties of ownership; that where a government or an individual has the control of any property of any species or kind, a river or what not, upon that government or upon that individual who has such control the obligation and the responsibility rests and cannot be evaded of putting and keeping the property in such a condition that it shall not do harm, damage, or injury to the property of other parties.

For instance, Mr. President, there is nothing startling in the proposition that where the Government of the United States owns a marine hospital it is the duty of the United States Government to establish such guardianship over that hospital, its property, and to provide such means that that hospital shall not become a nest of pestilential disease, so as to spread in the surrounding community. So in the case of a powder magazine; can any one doubt that it is the duty of the United States Government to exercise such control and such stewardship over that property that adjacent and contiguous property shall not be destroyed by any accident of explosion?

So it is, Mr. President, so far as national duty and national obligation are concerned, in cases even where the Government of the United States does not own the property. Is it not the duty of the United States Government for this reason, if for no other, to maintain discipline in its Army, so that the Army shall not become a mob to endanger the lives and property of citizens?

And the only rule of law which I invoke is a rule of universal application, binding upon governments as well as upon individuals, a rule of law which is coeval with the ownership of property itself, which has never been modified, and can never be modified so long as public order is considered necessary to the well-being of society: and that is that every person, legal, natural, or political, shall use and enjoy his property and keep it in such a condition that it shall not through neglect inflict damage and injury upon the property of other parties. It is not necessary for the application of this rule to establish that the United States Government has an absolute, unqualified title in the Mississippi River. We know that that river was purchased by the Federal Government, that the money was taken out of the Federal Treasury and paid for that river; and I am not quite certain that as the sovereign power, having acquired that river as it did, the Government of the United States has not a right even of disposing of that river, that the Government of the United States has not the jus disponendi. I am not prepared to say that there is not absolute ownership of the river by the United States Government so far as the United States Government can own any property. In one sense, all property that is owned by the United States Government is the property of the nation.

But let us take this illustration: The United States Government purchased Alaska. Suppose that there had been no individual vested rights; Alaska became the property of the nation; it became public property; it became the property of the people of the United States. Is it not clear that the United States Government by this same right which it had to acquire that property (and although the American people have a right to traverse that Territory and to carry on their commerce in that Territory) would have a right to dispose of that Territory, which right of disposal is the highest test of ownership?

But suppose you consider that the United States Government is only a trustee of the people with reference to this great stream, that it has only a fiduciary title as we call it in the civil law, that it has only a qualified title for a specific purpose, which is the purpose of public use and public commerce. Suppose that it be a property which is dedicated to public uses and which the Government of the United States cannot alienate, and therefore that it has only a qualified ownership to that property; suppose that the Government of the United States has not the same title to the Mississippi River which sovereignties on the continent of Europe have over the rivers within the dominions which they rule, I maintain that inasmuch as the Government of the United States, to the exclusion of the States, to the exclusion of any other authority, has exclusive jurisdictional control over the Mississippi River, the obligations and the responsibilities arising from that relation are precisely identical with those which would arise from absolute ownership. Take the case, for instance, of a public street, where even according to the original grant a street is dedicated to public uses and the political corporation has no power to alienate that street; yet it has been repeatedly decided in this country that although the corporation has only the power of administration and of police, which is absolute in the Federal Government as regards the Mississippi River, if that street is not kept in a proper condition and damage to property results from that neglect, the corporation is liable in damages to the party injured. And I can see no reason, Mr. President, upon the highest authority, why the Government of the United States is not responsible in damages to the thousands and thousands of people who have been ruined in the Mississippi Valley on account of the crevasses, for the reason that it is the duty of the United States, even in administration and control of its authority, to police the river and keep it within control, to discipline that river and to inclose it within its banks.

We know, Mr. President, that the jurisdictional authority of the United States Government is exclusive over that river throughout its length, and we know how that jurisdictional authority was acquired. It was acquired by the statutes of the United States and by the decisions of the Supreme Court. In the early period of our history there was a conflict going on between the Federal authority and the State governments with reference to the jurisdiction over navigable streams, a controversy which was as acrimonious upon the bench of the Supreme Court as was the slavery question. It was finally determined, after twenty-five years of contest, that the maritime and admiralty jurisdiction over those streams was exclusively vested in the Federal Government; and only a short time ago, as high up as Shreveport, on Red River, it was decided that the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction over that stream was exclusively vested in the United States Government. That jurisdiction is an exhaustive jurisdiction. It denies to the States any authority, or any power, or any responsibility, or any obligation whatsoever touching the Mississippi River. The United States Government can bridge it; the United States Government can determine what commerce shall be carried on that river, what shall be the means of transportation on that river, who shall have the privilege of navigating that river; and it is even said in one of the decisions of the Supreme Court that it has the authority to change the channel of that river.

Now, I ask, Mr. President, why is it, if every individual in this land, every corporation, is obliged to discharge the obligations and the responsibilities and the duties arising from the mere tutorship or control of property—I ask upon what ground can the United States absolve itself from that obligation and from that responsibility, particularly when we consider the immense loss and devastation and ruin which result from omitting to discharge that obligation? And I do not understand that there is any such thing as degree in national duties and national obligations. If I can convince the Senate that it is the duty of the United States Government, that it is an obligation of the United States Government, it then follows that it is as much a question of national faith to discharge that duty, to discharge that obligation, as for the Government of the United States to pay the interest on its public debt.

I will first, Mr. President, endeavor to show why there should be a direct appropriation for the purpose of building the levees on the Mississippi River; and I need not confess that I am not a scientist; that I know very little or nothing at all about hydrographic engineering. I have examined some very able reports which have been made on this subject; and the reasons which have been given by the United States engineers in favor of the levee system have convinced me that their conclusions are well-founded and justified. I shall then proceed to call the attention of the Senate to the legal proposition that it is the duty of the United States Government to build these levees arising from the relation existing between the Government and that river. I shall endeavor to do so as briefly as possible.

Mr. President, in presenting this bill I wish also to present some of the reasons which induce me to urge them on the favorable consideration of the Senate. The subject to which they refer embraces the relations of the people of the alluvial region lying between the Missouri and the sea with this Government, as affected by the river near which they reside and the dangers with which they are certainly threatened by its floods.

Although, Mr. President, the volume of waters which the Mississippi rolls to the sea is perhaps exceeded by that of the Amazon or of the Saint Lawrence, yet in the length of its course, in the variety of climates which it traverses, in the wealth and grandeur of the communities through which it flows, and in the resources of the territory which it drains, it has no rival on the face of the globe. Where the Missouri, its greatest confluent, issues from its birthplace in the Rocky Mountains it is already a great river. In the words of the British historian, Alison:

> Between stupendous walls of rock twelve hundred feet high, and three leagues in length whose overhanging cliffs darken the awful passage, it issues forth in a deep and foaming current, three hundred yards broad, and soon swelled by other tributary streams, winds its long and solitary way through the prairies to the falls, sixty miles distant, which rival Niagara itself in sublimity and grandeur. The Mississippi, the Ohio, the Tennessee, the Illinois, the Arkansas, the Kansas, the White River, the Red River, the Saint Peter, the Wisconsin, any one of which exceeds the Rhine or the Danube in magnitude and which have given their names to the mighty States which already are settled on their shores, are but the tributaries of this prodigious artery. These various rivers, all of which are navigable with their own affiliated set of tributary streams, several thousand in number, form a vast chain of inland navigation, all connected together, and issuing into the sea by one channel, which like the arteries and veins of the human body is destined to maintain an immense interior circulation, and convey life and health to the farthest extremities of the million of square miles which constitute the magnificent garden of Central America.
> It the majestic portal by which the Missouri issues from its icy cradle in the Rocky Mountains is one of the sublimest, the alluvial swamp through which it finds its way to the ocean in the Gulf of Mexico is one of the most interesting objects in nature. There one of the great formations of the earth is actually going forward; we are carried back to what occurred in our own continent before the creation of man. Like all great rivers, the Missouri, or the Mississippi as it is there called, does not empty itself into the sea in one continuous channel, but in a great variety of arms or mouths, which intersect in sluggish streams the great alluvial delta which is formed by the perpetual deposit of the immense volume of waters which it rolls into the sea.
> Between these mouths of the river a vast surface, half land, half water, from fifty to a hundred miles in width and three hundred in length, fringes the whole coast, and there the enormous mass of vegetable matter constantly brought down by the Mississippi is periodically deposited. A few feet are sufficient to bring it above the level of the water except in great floods, and as soon as that is done vegetation springs up with the utmost rapidity in that prolific slime. Nothing can be conceived so dreary and yet so interesting as the prospect of these immense alluvial swamps in the course of formation. As far as the eye can reach over hundreds of square leagues nothing is to be seen but marshes, bristling with roots, trunks, and branches of trees. In winter and spring, when the floods come down, they bring with them an incalculable quantity of these broken fragments, technically called logs, which cover not only the whole of this immense semi-marine territory, but floating over it strew the sea for several miles off to such an extent that ships have often no small difficulty in making their way through them. * * * At length, as the soil accumulates and hardens, a dwarfish shrub begins to appear above the surface; larger and larger trees succeed with the decay of their more stunted predecessors, and at length, on the scene of former desolation, the magnificent riches of the virgin forest are reared.

Since these eloquent sentences were written, more than a generation has passed away, and while the forces referred to by the historian remain unimpaired in vigor, the territory upon which they are exerted has been, in a measure, subjected by the hand of industry, and the opening to the plow of wide areas of cultivable and fertile land has illustrated the immense richness of the Mississippi alluvion and the vast resources which are latent in its soil.

In the basin which we are accustomed to call the Valley of the Mississippi the waters which fall upon an area of more than a million square miles descend from the Alleghany Range on the east and the immense barrier of the Rocky Mountains on the west, and are gathered into a single channel which drains this wide-extended tract and conducts its surplus waters to the sea at a point more than four thousand miles distant, by the course of the streams, from the sources of the Missouri. The area of the country drained by this magnificent river system is more than equal to all of Europe, exclusive of Russia and Scandinavia. Its extent is more than sixteen times that of France, and more than eleven times that of the British Islands, and more than two-thirds of it is capable of supporting a population as dense as that which is embraced within the limits of the most populous commonwealths of Europe. In exact figures, the drainage area of the river Mississippi is 1,244,000 square miles; the mean annual downfall of rain is 30.4 inches, the annual discharge is 21,300,000,000 cubic feet, and the mean discharge per second is 675,000 cubic feet.

At a time which may be considered remote when compared with the chronology of recorded history, but which is modern when contrasted with the measureless procession of preceding geological ages, the Mississippi was a clear-water river, like the Saint Lawrence, flowing to the sea with an even and comparatively gentle current, and debouching at a point near the site of the present town of Plaquemine, about two hundred and forty miles, by the course of the stream, from the existing mouth; about one hundred and forty miles in a direct line northwest of the Balize, and about a hundred miles north of the actual coast of the Gulf. After the river broke through the barrier of the Ozark Mountains, (an event to which the calculations of geologists assign an antiquity of about forty-four hundred years,) and drained away the vast fresh water sea which was then its source and its feeder, the character of the Mississippi became completely changed. From a clear and limpid stream, having an inconsiderable rise and fall, and carrying to the sea so insignificant a quantity of sediment that no bar could be formed at its mouth, it was converted into a turbid, delta-forming river, affected by great floods, and pushing along its bed so large a quantity of earthy matter that its deposits have, according to the computations of Lyell, within the relatively short space of forty-four hundred years, projected forward the coast line for a distance of more than a hundred miles, and formed nearly five thousand square miles of land where formerly stood the waters of the sea.

It is with this river—an agency at once creative and destructive, a power which is at the same time a friend and an enemy, a blessing and a curse—that we have now to deal. In approaching the questions which grow out of the phenomena by which the Mississippi is characterized, and before attempting the solution of those questions, it may be well to give a brief statement of the results arrived at by the topographical engineers who have studied the hydrography of the river, who have computed its forces and calculated its dynamical laws. As I have already said, the surplus waters of 1,244,000 square miles of territory are drained into the Mississippi. From the mouth of the Missouri to the Gulf there is a fall at high water of 416 feet. The average width of the river between its banks from Cairo to Memphis is 4,470 feet; from Gaines's Landing to Red River Landing, 4,080 feet; from Baton Rouge to Donaldsonville, 3,000 feet; from Carrollton to the head of the Passes, 2,470 feet. The depth at high water, taking the flood of 1858 as a standard, is 96 feet at Columbus, 119 feet near Randolph, 83 feet at Memphis, 88 feet below the mouth of the Arkansas, 87 feet at Lake Providence, 120 feet seven miles above Vicksburgh, 111 feet at New Carthage, 118 feet at Natchez, 126 feet at Red River Landing, 103 feet at Baton Rouge, 128 feet just below Plaquemine, 180 feet below Bonnet Carré Church, 82 feet below the Bonnet Carré crevasse, 138 feet seventeen miles above New Orleans, 137 feet at Carrollton, and 151 feet at Fort St. Philip. The range between high and low water is: at Cairo, 51 feet; at Memphis, 40 feet; at Natchez, 51 feet; at Red River Landing, 44.3 feet; at Baton Rouge, 31.1 feet; at Donaldsonville, 24.3 feet; at Carrollton, 14.4 feet; at Fort St. Philip, 4.5 feet; at the head of the Passes, 2.3 feet; and at the Gulf, zero. It appears (I quote from Humphreys and Abbot:)

I. That the law which governs the mean annual rise and fall of the Mississippi varies but little from the Ohio to the Gulf.

II. That the rains which accompany the three great changes in season, to wit, winter, spring, and summer, throughout the larger part of the Mississippi basin produce three corresponding rises in the river, augmented in the spring by melting snow.

III. That above the mouth of the Arkansas the rise occasioned by the rains and melting snow which attend the setting in of the southwest winds at the transition from winter to spring in the northern and eastern part of the great valley usually attains its highest point in the latter part of March. The river then subsides until the arrival (commonly in June) of the Rocky Mountain rise, swelled by the early summer rains of the Lower Missouri and by those of the eastern portion of the Mississippi basin. It then falls rapidly until the latter part of October, when the lowest point is attained. After remaining at a stand for two or three weeks, it again rises, and more rapidly than at any other season, until checked by freezing and the diminution of rain (precipitation) in the basins of the upper rivers in January and February.

IV. Below Red River the same general oscillations occur, but somewhat later in the season the only modification being that the tributaries of the Ohio contribute their corresponding floods somewhat later, and thus maintain the stand of the river for a longer period.

V. The river is above its midstage for seven months, from the latter part of December to the latter part of July, and below it for the rest of the year.

It will thus be seen that the season of high water for all the alluvial region embraces those months when planting operations are undertaken, and when the crops are growing; and that it lasts until past midsummer; that is to say, precisely those months in which the greatest injury may be inflicted by inundation and overflow on the agricultural industry of that part of the country.

In times of flood, which are imminent every year, and which in fact have occurred in two or three successive seasons twice during the last fifteen years, the whole of the alluvial region is liable to inundation. Against these floods the existing levees are scarcely even an approximate security. Even when they were in their best condition and had attained their greatest development, that is to say in the year 1861, they were entirely inadequate for the protection of the vast alluvial basins of Missouri, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana. It may be assumed with the utmost confidence that no local laws, no local efforts, will ever be found adequate to the solution of this momentous problem. Any system to be effective must be general, and the contingencies of uncombined human action, the conflicting interests of different localities, and the contradictory opinions of different individuals and communities present almost insurmountable obstacles to the adoption and consummation of any general system except through the agency and control of a single power like that of the Federal Government. As an illustration of the tremendous nature of the catastrophes which may at any time overwhelm the alluvial region of the Mississippi I shall refer briefly, Mr. President, to the flood of 1874. In that year there were thirty crevasses or breaks in the Louisiana levees alone, and these occurred at intervals along the whole distance from the Arkansas line to Point a la Hache, about fifty miles below New Orleans. The number, in fact, was much greater, because in some cases two or four and in one case as many as eleven breaks occurred at separate but neighboring points, and afterward combined into one.

Now, sir, a crevasse in the levees of the Mississippi River is something of which the imagination, unaided by observation, can scarcely form any accurate conception. At first it may be but a slender thread of water percolating through a crayfish hole, or a slight abrasion in the upper surface caused by the waves set in motion by a passing steamer or by a sudden storm, but in a few hours the seemingly innocent rill is swollen to a resistless torrent, the great wall of earth has given way before the tremendous pressure of the mighty river, and the waters rush through the opening with a force which soon excavates it to a depth of thirty or forty feet, with a roar which rivals the voice of Niagara and with a velocity which is great enough to draw an incautious steamer into the boiling vortex.

The effect is not simply that of an overflow, which may subside in a day or two. The level of the river, at its flood, is above that of the surrounding country; and, consequently, when the embankments break it is as if an ocean were turned upon the land. In a short time the neighboring country is converted into a sea. Cattle and horses are swept away and drowned, or forced to seek refuge on the few dry spots which remain among the seething waters; the crops are destroyed and the people are in many cases forced to abandon their homes. Sometimes, indeed, the land itself is greatly injured by these inundations; for, while the floods which come from the Red River, or the Ohio, or even the Arkansas, bring some compensation in the fertilizing character of the deposits which they leave behind, those of the Missouri, being charged with sand and alkaline earths swept down from the great deserts of the west, have a pernicious and sometimes even a ruinous effect on the lands which they invade.

In the year 1874 the phenomena which I have feebly described occurred on so extensive a scale that the catastrophe may well be regarded as a national calamity. Through the thirty Louisiana crevasses and the permanent openings in Arkansas and through the breaks on the left bank a vast body of water overspread a district of country more than three hundred miles in extent from north to south, and averaging fifty miles from east to west. I take no account, sir, in this statement, of the vast tracts inundated by the overflows of tributary rivers. I limit myself to the direct influence of the Mississippi waters from the Arkansas southward, and within this region, more than three hundred miles in length by fifty miles in width, as I have said, about twenty-two thousand square miles, much of it arable and cultivated land, much of it the most productive portion of the Southwest, was laid under water for many weeks.

Think of it, Mr. President; think of it, Senators; ponder it well—fifteen million acres of productive land—fifteen million acres, embracing a large proportion of the rich cotton and corn and sugar districts of three States, were flooded by this great national highway, this magnificent stream which is the property of the nation and over which the nation claims and exercises supreme and exclusive control. Consider it well, and then tell me, if you can, that such a calamity is local as to its character, local as to its consequences, local as to the duties which it imposes and the responsibilities which it entails. In further illustration of the disastrous nature of that great flood—the overflow of 1874—I may say that it inundated, in Arkansas, the counties of Chicot and Desha; in Mississippi, the counties of Tunica, Coahoma, Bolivar, Sunflower, Washington, Issaquena, and Warren, and in Louisiana, the parishes of East Carroll, West Carroll, Madison, Tensas, Concordia, Morehouse, Richland, Ouachita, Franklin, Caldwell, Catahoula, Avoyelles, Pointe Coupée, Saint Landry, (in part,) East Baton Rouge, (in part,) West Baton Rouge, Iberville, Saint Martin, Iberia, Saint Mary, Terre Bonne, Assumption, Ascension, Saint James, Saint John the Baptist, Saint Charles, La Fourche, Orleans, Jefferson, Saint Bernard, and Plaquemines—thirty counties and parishes.

And to exhibit more conspicuously the destruction caused by floods like that of 1874 I present a series of tabulated statements, showing the amount and value of the productions and the number of acres of improved land, with its cash valuation, in the region liable to overflow in the present condition of the Mississippi levees. I shall not challenge your patience, Mr. President, by reading the detailed statement, but I shall give the aggregates, which will be sufficient for my present purpose. In the sugar and rice growing districts of Louisiana there were under cultivation, in the year 1860, 848,753 acres of land. The cash value of the plantations was $93,227,877; the number of hogsheads of sugar produced was 321,210; the number of gallons of molasses produced was 14,007,468; the number of pounds of rice produced was 6,252,051. In 1870 the number of pounds of rice was 15,045,761. In the counties of Chicot and Desha, in Arkansas, and the parishes of Madison, Carroll, Tensas, and Concordia, in Louisiana, in 1860, the improved acres were 535,497; cash value of plantations, $62,000,000; number of bales of cotton produced, 387,000; number of bushels of corn, 3,000,000. In the alluvial region of Mississippi and Tennessee, in the same year, the improved acres were 1,024,628; the cash value of the plantations, $60,000,000; number of bales of cotton produced, 410,000; number of bushels of corn, 26,000,000. In the basin of Saint Francis, (Arkansas and Missouri,) in the same year, the improved acres were 245,364; cash value of plantations, $15,000,000; number of bushels of corn produced, 3,700,000; number of bales of cotton, 40,000. So that in 1860 the cash value of the plantations in the alluvial region was $230,000,000.

I have said, sir, that during this great flood the alluvial region was laid under water for a period of time extending over many weeks. Such, I may say, is the case in all seasons of overflow. The subsidence of the river is a far slower process than its rise. In many cases the duration of the inundation is to be measured not alone by days or by weeks, but by months. The record from 1849 to 1860, inclusive, shows the duration of high water in particular years to have been as follows: In 1849, at Carrollton, (adjoining New Orleans,) 220 days; 1850, at Carrollton, 172 days; 1851, at Lake Providence, 97 days; at New Carthage, 104 days; at Red River Landing, 50 days; at Donaldsonville, 63 days; at Carrollton, 125 days; 1852, at Donaldsonville, 68 days; at Carrollton, 108 days; 1853, at Carrollton, 150 days; 1854, at Carrollton, 111 days; 1858, at Memphis, 87 days; at Napoleon, 100 days; at New Carthage, 129 days; at Red River Landing, 118 days; at Donaldsonville, 129 days; at Carrollton, 190 days; 1859, at Memphis, 95 days; at Vicksburgh, 103 days; at Donaldsonville, 123 days; at Carrollton, 114 days. Five of these years were flood years; that is to say, years in which the alluvial region was overflowed in whole or in part.

During the period from 1865 to 1877 the same phenomena have recurred in several years and, owing to the impaired condition of the levees, to the impoverishment of the riparian populations, and the inability of the State governments or the county or parish organizations to take any efficient measures for protection, the consequences have been even more disastrous, because more severely felt than those attendant upon the great overflows which happened during the period first referred to. At such times the whole country for hundreds of miles is converted into a mimic sea. The adventurous explorer who penetrates these dreary wastes finds, instead of widening fields green with the corn and cane or gay with the blossoms of the cotton-plant, only a wilderness of turbid waters—a horizon limited on one side by the interminable line of the cypress swamp, on the other by the devastating river, and all between a watery desert. His highway is the flood; his conveyance the pirogue. Here and there a lonely house rises above the deluge to mark the site of man's fruitless contest against the tremendous forces of nature—of the defeat of his efforts and the ruin of his hopes. At intervals may be seen groups of horses, cows, oxen—lean and famished beasts struggling against starvation, whose bones will whiten the few dry places which have afforded them a temporary refuge. Such is the spectacle presented during an overflow of the Mississippi River; a phenomenon which, as I have said, is not infrequent of occurrence or limited in duration, but which happens at least five out of every eight years, and endures for days and weeks and months.

I take it for granted, Mr. President, that the levee system, as tested by experience, and as developed and perfected according to the calculations of the highest scientific authority, is that which must finally be adopted for the protection of the alluvial region of the Mississippi. I take this for granted, I say, because although other methods have been suggested and other plans devised, these methods and these plans, whatever may be their merit, however distinguished for intelligence and attainments their authors may be, can be regarded only as unverified hypotheses. In the report of General Humphreys and General Abbot on The Physics and Hydraulics of the Mississippi River—a work which may be described as a monument of profound research, of scientific skill, and of conclusive reasoning applied to the solution of hydrographical problems—in that great work the whole question of the protection of the alluvial region against overflow is exhaustively discussed. All the arguments against the levee system and in favor of it, and also the arguments for and against the proposed systems of cut-offs, outlets, and lateral reservoirs are thoroughly considered. I cannot do better, Mr. President, than to quote the language of the report, as to the conclusions reached by its eminent authors:

> The preceding discussion of the different plans of protection has been so elaborate and the conclusions adopted have been so well established, that little remains to be said under the head of recommendations. It has been demonstrated that no advantage can be derived either from diverting tributaries or from constructing reservoirs, that the plans of cut-offs, and of new or enlarged outlets to the Gulf are too costly and too dangerous to be attempted. The plan of levees on the contrary, which has always recommended itself by its simplicity and its direct repayment of investments, may be relied upon for protecting all the alluvial bottom lands liable to inundation below Cape Girardeau. The works, it is true, will be extensive and costly, and will exact much more unity of action than has thus far been attained. The recent Legislature of Mississippi in organizing a judicious state system of operations, however, shows that the necessity of more concert is beginning to be understood.

We are told by the report that to secure this end in the most economical manner levees should be constructed. Near the mouth of the Ohio they should be made about three feet above the actual high-water level of 1858, the year selected as the plane of reference. The height above this level should be gradually increased to about seven feet at Osceola. Thence to Helena this height should be maintained. Thence to Island 71 the height should be gradually increased to ten feet. Thence to Napoleon it may be gradually reduced to eight feet. Thence to Lake Providence it must gradually be increased to eleven feet. Thence to the mouth of the Yazoo it may be gradually reduced to about six feet, which elevation should be maintained to Red River Landing. Between Red River Landing and Baton Rouge it should be uniformly about four feet, and below Baton Rouge about three feet.

These calculations are the results of the reasonings of Humphreys and Abbot, but it must be remarked that they are based on the supposition of absolute security, as far as the conditions of absolute security can be ascertained. It is to be remarked, also, that all authorities agree that the results to be desired can be reached—in other words, the problem can be solved—only by means of the application of combined effort to a uniform system. The concert of action among the riparian States suggested by Humphreys and Abbott is a chimera. It can never be assured. In order that it may be attained, even supposing conflicting interests and opposing theories be reconciled and a uniform system to be decided on, it can never even then be attained, Mr. President, even if the people of these States were convinced that the duties and responsibilities of this great work are not duties justly appertaining and responsibilities properly belonging to the Federal Government. That these duties and responsibilities are national and not local; that they are chargeable to the account of the National Government, and not to individuals, to local organizations or communities, or to State governments, is a proposition which the people of the riparian States firmly believe to be founded in reason, in morals, and in law.

In order, Mr. President, to show how futile must be any merely local efforts, any system even, however elaborate and complete, that may be limited to one or even two States, any system that one or two States are capable of carrying into effect, it is necessary only to look at the existing condition of things and to consider the laws which govern the regimen of the Mississippi River. Suppose, for instance, that the State of Louisiana were to build her levees, were to construct them so high and so strong that they would present an effectual barrier to the pressure of the river rolling along their front, would this be enough for the protection of the State? It would be all that the State could do. It would fill the measure of her power, but would it suffice? By no means, sir. For several months, in every season of high water during the last twelve years, the whole region embraced in the parishes of East Carroll, West Carroll, Madison, Concordia, and part of Avoyelles has been submerged by floods originating not entirely in crevasses in the Louisiana levees, but coming in a great part through the vast openings above the Louisiana lines.

In the State of Arkansas, between the State line and the Arkansas River, the whole river front is practically open. There are, in fact, twenty-eight miles of permanent crevasse within that distance, and the old levees still remaining are comparatively useless. Through these openings pours an immense volume of water, which, finding its way through Cypress Creek and Boggy Bayou, first fills and then overflows the great Arkansas swamp from which, issuing through Bayou Maçon, Bayou Bartholomew, and other streams, it invades Louisiana and lays under water the whole country as far south as Red River. If Red River is full, to the extent of its discharging capacity, the flood overruns the basin of the Atchafalaya and ravages the parishes of Pointe Coupée, Iberville, Assumption, Saint Martin, Iberia, and Saint Mary, and finally loses itself in the sea at Berwick's Bay. It follows, then, that any efforts within the power of Louisiana to make any system of levees that the State might devise or execute would necessarily be inconclusive and ineffectual unless supplemented by concerted and harmonious action on the part of Arkansas—a State over which Louisiana has no jurisdiction. Such a system, elaborate though it might be, perfect though it might be, as to all the forces of the river that Louisiana can control, would still leave the State exposed to inundation for its whole extent, from the Arkansas line to the sea for an average breadth from east to west of at least thirty miles. That is to say nine thousand square miles, or nearly six million acres would be liable to inundation by floods which the State of Louisiana or the people of that State would be powerless to avert.

In addition to this, sir, the consequence of the construction of a perfect system of levees by Mississippi would be to throw an additional volume of water on the Louisiana side; or, if a perfect system were constructed in Louisiana, the amount of water thrown on the Mississippi side would be proportionally augmented. If both States should establish efficient levees along their river fronts, the effect would be to raise the flood level of the lower course of the river, the slope would thus be decreased, the decrease of slope would be attended by a corresponding diminution of velocity, and necessarily of discharging capacity, and thence would follow a raising of the level of the river above and a greater liability to overflow, and more frequent inundations from the mouth of the Ohio to the Louisiana line.

It appears, Mr. President, from the report to which I have already referred, that in the flood year 1858 the actual amount of water per second, at the period of maximum discharge, passing certain specified points on the river, was as follows:

	Cubic feet.
Helena	1,334,000
Napoleon	1,221,000
Lake Providence	1,188,000
Vicksburgh	1,245,000
Red River Landing	1,238,000
Carrollton	1,188,000

The reclamation by leveeing of the swamps below Cape Girardeau would have caused a plus discharge represented by the following figures:

	Cubic feet per second.
Halena	35,000
Napoleon	197,000
Lake Providence	218,000
Vicksburgh	185,000
Red River Landing	100,000
Carrollton	109,000

It follows that leveeing the river above would raise the flood level below proportional to the augmented volume of the water thus confined within the bank, and that, as a consequence, any local system devised and executed by the States of Missouri, Arkansas, and Tennessee would compel the States of Louisiana and Mississippi to raise their levees to a height sufficiently great to protect those States against the increased floods. Since the discharge is a product of the area of the cross-section into the velocity, we find (estimating the mean width of the river at 3,000 feet and crediting to increase of velocity enough to raise the rate to 8 feet per second, which may be regarded as excessive) that the State of Louisiana would be forced to raise her levees 9 feet at Lake Providence, 7.7 feet opposite Natchez, and 4.5 feet at New Orleans.

Hence the general conclusion is that a perfect system of levees, constructed along the lower course of the river alone, would still leave Louisiana exposed to disastrous inundations. In any case these levees would raise the flood level above, and oblige Arkansas, Tennessee, and Missouri to raise their levees to a greater height than would suffice in case the lower river remained unleveed. These conclusions are based upon the established and admitted laws of dynamical hydrography. They show beyond dispute that local effort must forever be ineffectual to solve the momentous problem under consideration; and they impart to the work a character of nationality more perfect and complete than can be attributed to any that the Federal Government has ever undertaken.

I repeat, sir, that there is no prospect, that there is scarcely even a possibility, of assuring protection to the lands now actually cleared for cultivation within the limits of the riparian States by means of any local efforts or systems, and that, without the adoption of a general system such as the Federal Government alone has the power to enforce, the reclamation of the vast tracts of alluvion which would by such a system be brought within the domain of agricultural industry must be remitted to a far-distant future. The experience of more than one hundred and fifty years has demonstrated the futility of individual effort and the failure of all attempts to frame an effective organization within the States themselves. These failures cannot be attributed to any lack of energy or of effort on the part of the alluvial States or of the people of those States. On the contrary, the history of those communities is a record of untiring labor and of specious although unavailing experiment lavished on the problem of protection against the Mississippi floods, and the actual money expended from time to time in this work would more than suffice, if accumulated in a single fund and expended under judicious control, to levee the river from the mouth of the Ohio to the sea and to assure that absolute security promised by the system which Humphreys and Abbot have proposed.

I say again, sir, that with the lights now before us, with the experience of a hundred and fifty years to guide and instruct us, with the deductions of science and of reason at our command, the utter failure of all local and uncombined efforts may be confidently predicted, however great may be the sums expended upon them, and whatever seeming advantages they may confer on isolated communities or particular individuals. The protection of Missouri is possible only at the expense of Arkansas; the protection of Arkansas can be accomplished only at the cost of Louisiana and Mississippi; the protection of the country above the Louisiana line might entail permanent ruin on all the country below; the protection of the country below might involve the desolation of all the country above; protection to the whole can be attained only by a uniform and harmonious system, devised and carried into effect by a single and superior authority, such as that of the Federal Government. In short, to quote the language of Major Warren, of the topographical engineers, in a recent able report on this subject:

> The experience of over one hundred and fifty years has utterly failed to create judicious laws or effective organization in the several States themselves, and no systematic co-operation has been even attempted between them. The latter is no less important than the former, for the river has no respect for State boundaries, and deluges Arkansas through breaks in the levees of Missouri and overflows Louisiana by floods passing across the Arkansas line.

In a report now before me, made by the state engineer of Louisiana to the last session of the General Assembly of that State, these words are used:

It is equally just and important that the Federal Government should undertake the reclamation from overflow of the alluvial regions of the Mississippi Valley. No friends of any one of the plans proposed for this great work claim success unless their system can be applied throughout.

A commission of Federal and most distinguished civil engineers have elaborated and reported a general plan for the construction of levees which, if thoroughly applied to Louisiana alone, would inundate Arkansas and Mississippi and vice versa.

* * * * * * *

Twenty States and Territories have a servitude for drainage through Louisiana. Steamers from ten thousand miles of navigable rivers dash their waves against her levees.

The failure of the State of Arkansas to keep up her levees causes crevasses which annually inundate large tracts of our richest lands and practically denies to Louisiana the right of self-protection from overflow.

A work of such magnitude, requiring so correct, uniform, and efficient a system of engineering and finance can only be brought to a successful result as a national undertaking, free from the divisions of local interests and opinions, and independent of the precarious resources of impoverished States.

Mr. President, I challenge a refutation of these propositions. I challenge a refutation of these propositions, sir, because I know and you know, sir, and every Senator on this floor knows, that an attempt to refute them would be to deny the most conspicuous facts of physical geography and to contradict the plainest deductions of science. An examination of the history of this question will show that the riparian States, and especially the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, have used every effort and have expended vast sums of money in the fruitless endeavor to assure for themselves a reasonable immunity against the floods of our great national river. More than twenty years ago the Federal Government made to the alluvial States a donation of the swamp and overflowed lands lying within those States, it being a condition of the gift that the proceeds should be used in the construction of levees and in draining the lands subject to overflow. It was a munificent gift, a gift worthy of a great nation and of the great purposes which inspired it. But it failed because the administration and employment of the funds arising from the sale of these lands were controlled by local authorities and for local objects. In short, no amount of fidelity and sagacity and energy in the execution of this trust by the States acting separately could be attended with other than partial success and transient benefits; success sure in the end to be followed by renewed disaster, and benefits certain to be followed by the accumulated losses which necessarily result from disjointed systems and uncombined operations.

But, sir, the very fact that this magnificent donation was made, the very conditions which were attached to it, prove that even the Congress of the United States recognized the national character of this work and admitted the obligations which its national character imposed upon the Federal Government. The donated lands were the property of the nation. They were assets, which, if not then available, could be made available, and which, had the Government itself assumed the task which, perhaps magnanimously but certainly mistakenly, it remitted to the riparian States, would have produced a fund sufficient to levee the river from the Ohio to the Gulf and to bring within the domain of cultivation a region the products of which would have augmented the wealth of the country by hundreds of millions of dollars. If the Government had done directly what it thus attempted to do indirectly it would have done that which the people of the riparian States are now asking at the hands of the nation.

It will be seen, Mr. President, from what I have already said, that the question which constantly presents itself for consideration is whether or not the duty of undertaking and perfecting this great work rightly attaches to the Federal Government, or whether it must be discharged by the communities which border on the river or the people who live upon its banks. Do the encroachments of the Mississippi floods upon the property of the neighboring inhabitants and the industries of the contiguous States impose on the General Government the responsibility of protecting the property and the industries thus exposed to annually recurring losses, or must those States and their inhabitants protect themselves against the destructive agencies of a vast river over which they have no jurisdiction, no control, no right of ownership? In considering this question I remit to a secondary place the immeasurable benefits which would result from reclaiming the vast spaces now subject to inundation and rendering them available for cultivation. In the eye of the economist and the statesman it cannot be regarded as unimportant that the waste of cypress swamp and impenetrable thicket, dominated alone by the waters which the Mississippi brings from the Alleghanies and the Rocky Mountains, should be converted into fair and level fields fit for the plow and capable of adding to the wealth of the nation the untold millions which would spring from their surface in the product of the cotton-plant and the sugar-cane alone.

I therefore do not exclude this branch of the subject from my argument, but if I cannot establish that apart from any consideration of the indisputable material advantages, in a national point of view, to be derived from the reclamation of the waste places and the protection of the improved lands of the Lower Mississippi, by means of an efficient levee system—if I cannot show, Mr. President, apart from such considerations, that the duty of undertaking and perfecting this great work rests upon this Government; that it is a national, a legal, and a moral responsibility of the highest order—I shall be willing to abandon the case, and to say to my constituents and to the people of Mississippi and to the people of Arkansas, that for all time to come they are fated to combat the impetuous floods of the great national river and to expend their labor and the profits of their industry in keeping the devastating waters from their doors.

The most superficial examination, Mr. President, of a map of the United States is enough to impress the observer with the truly national character of that magnificent river, which forms the most conspicuous feature of our geography. Every State and every Territory lying between the Rocky Mountains and the Alleghanies, from the Dominion of Canada on the north, to the Mexican Gulf on the south, is watered in whole or in part by the Mississippi and its affluents. The floods which annually menace with ruin the industrious cultivators of Louisiana and Mississippi and Arkansas, and doom to sterility millions of acres potentially rich in all the varied products of the temperate and semi-tropical latitudes, do not come from Louisiana skies, but are poured down upon the lower country from the melting of snows a thousand miles away, and the freshets of far-distant rivers. It is a remarkable fact that the annual rain-fall of the whole country below the mouth of the Arkansas, for an extent of more than a hundred miles on either side of the Mississippi, would by itself have scarcely any appreciable influence on the annual rise and fall of the river. In the month of May, 1872, more than seven inches of rain fell at New Orleans within less than seven hours, a phenomenon almost unprecedented in the history of meteorological observations, at least in this country, and yet that tremendous downpour did not raise the level of the Mississippi a measurable fraction of an inch.

It is true, however, that a great and sudden rain-storm, accompanied by high winds, is a source of danger when the river is up to the top of the levees. The slightest increase is then apt, under the agitation caused by high winds, to abrade the levees and cause crevasses.

No, sir. The swamps of the lower country are filled, the levees are broken, the plantations are inundated by the vast volume of water rolled down into the channel of the Mississippi by the Missouri, the Ohio, the Illinois, the Wisconsin, the Upper Mississippi, and the Arkansas. When the Signal Office of this Government announces the impending rains which are to fertilize the fields of Ohio and Illinois and Indiana, of Wisconsin and Iowa and Kansas, and which are to fill their granaries with a wealth of agricultural products, to the people of the alluvial States it conveys a note of warning and alarm. When the same authority proclaims that commerce and industry are to be released and the wheels of a thousand steamers are to be set in motion by the breaking of the icy fetters which have bound the Northern rivers in their beds, it foretells to the people of the lower riparian States the speedy coming of the foe who so often before has ravaged their fields, has devasted their homes, destroyed their property, and blighted their hopes. Against an enemy like this the efforts of individuals, of communities, of States, have always hitherto been powerless. It is not too much to say that such efforts, disjointed, fragmentary, local in their character, as they must continue to be, cannot within any period over which our view of the future can extend, be attended with other than local and fragmentary benefits; and that under such a system generations, perhaps centuries, will pass away before the vast alluvial spaces of the Lower Mississippi Valley will be reclaimed from the dominion of the waters.

Thus it is clear that in all its physical aspects, and as to all its physical phenomena, the Mississippi River is national in its character, national through its whole course (including its greater affluents) from the Rocky Mountains, or the Alleghanies, or the plateau of Northern Minnesota, to its mouth on the shores of the Mexican Gulf. It would seem that the questions arising out of its regimen—that the duties and responsibilities springing out of the action of its waters on the lands through which it flows are, in like manner, national duties and national responsibilities. But, sir, I am prepared to go further than this. I am prepared to show that the Federal Government has not only assumed exclusive jurisdiction over all the waters of the Mississippi; that it not only possesses undoubted dominion over it, to the exclusion of all other powers, whether foreign governments or State governments, but that the United States, the nation, in fact, claims the absolute, unqualified, and indisputable ownership of the river; and that this has been the doctrine of the Government, the uncontradicted doctrine, in regard to all navigable rivers flowing through more than one State, from the year 1793 to the present moment.

For some years after the adoption of the Constitution it was believed that the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States was limited to tide-water. But in the year 1845 an act of Congress extended the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the Federal courts to all navigable waters flowing between or connecting ports in different States and Territories, and to the "lakes and navigable waters connecting said lakes." This jurisdiction is in its nature exclusive, and has been decided to be exclusive by the Supreme Court. The ninth section of the judiciary act of 1789, by which the first courts of admiralty were established, declares that the district courts

Shall have exclusive cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction * * * on waters which are navigable from the sea * * * as well as upon the high seas.

In Hine vs. Trevor, (4 Wallace,) Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion of the court, says:

It must be taken, therefore, as the settled law of this court that wherever the district courts of the United States have original cognizance of admiralty causes, by virtue of the act of 1789, that cognizance is exclusive, and no other court, State or national, can exercise it, with the exception always of such concurrent remedy as is given by the common law.

In The Propeller Genesee Chief et al. vs. Fitzhugh et al., (12 Howard,) Chief-Justice Taney, in delivering the opinion of the court, refutes and completely disposes of the doctrine that the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States is limited to tide-water. Referring to the case of Waring vs. Clark, (5 Howard,) the Chief-Justice says:

But that case showed the unreasonableness of giving a construction to the Constitution which would measure the jurisdiction of the admiralty by the tide. For if such be the construction then a line drawn across the river Mississippi would limit the jurisdiction, although there were ports of entry above it and the water as deep and navigable and the commerce as rich and exposed to the same hazards and incidents as the commerce below. The distinction would be purely artificial and arbitrary as well as unjust, and would make the Constitution of the United States subject one part of a public river to the jurisdiction of a court of the United States and deny it to another part equally public and but a few yards distant.

It is thus shown to be the settled and undisputed doctrine of the law, as expounded by the highest of all judicial tribunals, that the exclusive admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States extends to all the navigable waters of the Mississippi Valley. But further than this, sir, I maintain that the Government of the United States, the nation, that is to say, is the proprietor, the owner of the river, from the point where it begins to be navigable to the sea. And in this I have the sanction of the judgment of Thomas Jefferson, the founder of the party to which I belong, and the man to whom, above all others, is due that magnificent acquisition which has given us the ownership of the greatest river of the globe, and which has enabled our country to rival in population, in wealth, in extent, and in resources the proudest nations of the civilized world.

In the year 1793 Mr. Jefferson, then Secretary of State, addressed to the citizen Genet, representing the French Republic, a communication in which he refers to the capture of the British ship Grange, by the French frigate l'Embuscade, within the Delaware. Accompanying this communication he transmits a statement by the Attorney-General, Mr. Edmund Randolph, of the grounds on which the Government of the United States had determined that it was "bound to see that the crew be liberated and the vessel and cargo restored to their former owners." In this opinion it is declared that "the corner-stone of our claim is that the United States are proprietors of the lands on both sides of the Delaware from its head to its entrance into the sea."

This, sir, is the doctrine of this Government, proclaimed to the whole world by Mr. Jefferson—a statesman whose authority on questions involving the principles of the democratic party and the rights of the States will not be disputed—and confirmed equally by the common sense of mankind as expressed by the law of nations. (See Grotius, b. 2, c. 2, s. 12; Puff., b. 3, c. 3, s. 4; Puff., b. 4, c. 5, s. 3; Vattel, b. 1, c. 22, s. 226.) But it is superfluous to accumulate authorities on this point. It is an axiom of public law that when a river rises and debouches within the territory of one nation, the possession or dominion of that river belongs to the government representing that nation. If this is true of a river like the Delaware, as proclaimed by Mr. Jefferson, how much more must it be true of that stupendous stream which waters half of the territory of the nation, and upon the banks of which have arisen mighty commonwealths and flourishing cities.

I maintain, sir, that the Mississippi is the property of the Union; to obtain the ownership and absolute control of it was the motive which compelled its acquisition; to retain that control and that ownership the Union fought to a successful issue a long and bloody war, and crushed the most formidable resistance to national authority that history records. I maintain, sir, after a mature consideration of the facts of our history, of the doctrines of our law, of the decisions of our courts, and of the attitude uniformly assumed by our Government, that no species of property can be more national in its character. The title is national, the property is national, the dominion is national. No other sovereignty, no other power can assert any claim to the control or ownership of the Mississippi River. Can it be pretended that as regards the use of its property and the obligations of its ownership the United States has greater rights or fewer responsibilities than any other sovereign power; that it may reap the full benefit and enjoyment of so vast and magnificent a trust, and yet escape from and repudiate the responsibilities which its use imposes; that it may legislate to regulate, to police, to protect every species of property floating upon this river, to change its channel, to determine how or by whom it shall be used, and yet that the Government claiming and exercising these powers, proclaiming this absolute and undivided ownership, has no power so to regulate its flow that its devastating waters shall no longer be permitted to destroy the property, the peace, the happiness, and the hope of millions of toiling American citizens? Even when a foreign nation owned the soil on both banks of the river above its mouth, you asserted not only the right of navigation, but the right of deposit on the foreign soil which then constituted its banks. This was called and was admitted to be an imperfect right; but you secured it because you threatened war against Spain if it was not conceded.

In whose interest, sir, did the Government of the United States take this bold stand? In the interest, Mr. President, of those who were cultivating the soil on the banks of the Ohio, and the Wabash, and the Illinois, of the Tennessee, the Cumberland, and the Kentucky, affluents of the great river, but not the river itself. It was taken in their interest in order that their products might find an unimpeded outlet to the sea. And now, sir, the citizens of the alluvial States are asking this same Government, not to declare war against a foreign nation in their interest, not to set armies in the field and navies on the sea in order that the labor of their hands may be rendered more profitable and the products of their lands find an easier highway to their destined markets, but simply that you shall use this great national river, this national highway, this national property, in such a manner that the labor of their hands may have its legitimate reward, that the products of their lands may not year after year be destroyed by the unchecked flow of the river, and that they may not be made starving paupers on the richest soil on the face of the earth.

And are we to be told, in answer, that the Government might rightfully declare war in the interest of the cultivators of the valley of the Ohio, and in order to assure to the products of that region an unimpeded access to the sea through territory over which this Government had then no control; but that it cannot, in the interest of the cultivators of the alluvial lands of the Lower Mississippi, and to preserve their property and their productions from utter ruin and destruction, employ the resources of science and the agencies of industry in a war against those natural forces which originate within its jurisdiction and which are entirely within its control?

"Peace," we are told by the prince of English poets, "hath its victories no less renowned than war." Who shall say, sir, that such a victory achieved by peaceful methods over the tremendous forces of nature would not be more worthy of a great nation, more renowned in history, than the bloody triumphs of armies in the field or navies on the sea?

It is a maxim of law, Mr. President, that the owner of property shall not so use it as to injure the property of others. Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas. Does our National Government comply with this obligation in its conduct toward the people of the riparian States, in the use which it makes of that great national highway the river Mississippi? I maintain, sir, that it does not. I have shown that the Federal Government owns that river absolutely, entirely, exclusively. I have shown that the floods which devastate the alluvial States are rolled down upon them through distances measured by thousands of miles and yet entirely within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, and that those States have no power, acting separately, to protect themselves against these floods, by any effort however great, by any expenditure of money however profuse. Can it be said, then, that the nation uses its property in conformity with the maxim which I have quoted; that it manifests in its use of that river even a decent respect for the rights and property of the people of the alluvial States when it allows them year after year to be ravaged, desolated, ruined, by the waters of that stream over which it claims and exercises undisputed sovereignty and exclusive control?

And here, Mr. President, as the question of exclusive jurisdiction is an important element in the consideration of this subject, I would refer again to the decisions of the Supreme Court which I have already quoted, and to the language of Justice Wayne in delivering the opinion of the court in Waring et al. vs. Clarke, 5 Howard, 495:

But the rule of tide-water within a county, and not on the sea, conforms to no code or precedent; neither marching boldly over all which is navigable, nor halting where the ocean meets the land; neither shunning to make wide inroads into the territories of juries, nor pushing as far as all which is nautical and commercial goes. The only plausible apology for it which I can find is in a total misconception, before adverted to, of the ancient and true rule, which was tide-water, but, at the same time, tide-water without the body of the county, on the high seas. But instead of the flux and reflux of the tide on the high seas, and without the body of the county or State, and to support which line stood the great pillars of a jury trial and the common law, have been attempted to be substituted, and that without authority of any statute or clause in the Constitution, as to torts, the impulses of the tides from any and every distance from the ocean sometimes encroaching from one to two hundred miles into the interior of counties and States and prostrating those great pillars most valuable to the people of the States. And what, let me repeat the inquiry, is to be gained by such a hazardous construction? Not an adherence to old and established rules, not a respect for State rights; not strengthening the Union, or its clear powers where assailed, but weakening by extending them to doubtful, irritating, and unnecessary topics; not an extension of a good system, allowing the admiralty to be one for all nautical matters, to all navigable waters and commercial questions, but falling short, in some of our vast rivers or inland seas, nearly one thousand miles from the head of navigation, and cutting off several cities with twenty, thirty, and even forty thousand population.

In the same opinion it is said that the bends are such that a boat must cross the stream three hundred and ninety times from New Orleans to Saint Louis. This repeated crossing and recrossing of the river by the thousands of steamers which ply on its waters during the season of high water is a fruitful source of danger. Crevasses have often been caused by the abrasion of the levees due to the attrition of the waters thus disturbed, and the contact of the waves that radiate from the wheels of a passing steamer. When the river is almost even with the tops of the levees—I mean such levees as the people of the States in question have hitherto been able to construct, and not such levees as those which promise absolute security, according to the calculations of eminent engineers, to which I have been so often referred—at such a time, I say, a slight and seemingly innocent displacement of the confined waters, by which the level along the neighboring bank may be raised only a few inches, is often sufficient to cause a sudden break, through which vast tracts of country may be inundated and millions of dollars' worth of property be destroyed. These disastrous consequences result from the navigation of the river and its employment for commercial purposes.

The Government guarantees to the cultivators of the soil of the States north of the Ohio and the Missouri the use of the Mississippi as a highway for the transportation of their products to distant markets; it appropriates money to improve the navigation of the river, to remove obstructions from it, to deepen its channel. All of these things it does in the interest of trade and commerce and navigation and for the "general welfare"—I will not say the particular welfare, Mr. President—of the people of the northern part of the great valley; and in thus doing, in thus dedicating the river to these uses and assuming and exercising control of it for these uses, it inflicts irreparable damage upon the people of the lower part of that valley. The uses of the river for these purposes have a national character which is not disputed, a national character which justifies and demands the intervention of this Government by way of congressional legislation, of judicial control, and of the appropriation of moneys from the public Treasury; and yet the responsibilities growing directly out of these uses, dependent on them, created by them, have no such national character and may properly be repudiated. The duties are national, but the correlative responsibilities consequent on the discharge of those duties are local.

Can this be true, Mr. President? Does not such a proposition carry refutation on its face? Is not its simple statement its disproof? I submit, sir, that if the United States had never acquired the possession and the sovereignty of the Lower Mississippi; had that possession and that sovereignty remained in the hands of a foreign power, the right of free navigation and the right of deposit at New Orleans being conceded to this country as they were originally conceded by treaty with Spain, all damages accruing from such use of the river by American vessels would have constituted a valid basis for reclamation against this Government. And shall it now be said that while our duties have become enlarged, while our control has been extended, while our powers have been augmented, our responsibilities have become lessened until they have completely disappeared? Can it be asserted that we owe less to our own citizens under these new conditions than we should have owed to the subjects of a foreign power under the conditions which prevailed before we took possession of the country? Can it be maintained that our obligations toward the people of Missouri and Arkansas and Louisiana are not at least as binding in a national point of view as the obligations which would have been due to the subjects of Spain in an international point of view? No Senator on this floor, sir, I seriously believe, will maintain a paradox so gross.

When Mr. Jefferson in his message to Congress (4 Am. State papers, 494) communicated the information of the acquisition of Louisiana, he used these words:

> While the property and sovereignty of the Mississippi and its waters secure an independent outlet for the produce of the Western States and an uncontrolled navigation through their whole course, free from collision with other powers and the dangers to our peace from that source, the fertility of the country, its climate and extent, promise in due season important aids to our Treasury, an ample provision for our posterity, and a wide spread for the blessings of freedom and equal laws.

It is plain that the sagacious mind of Mr. Jefferson foresaw in the acquisition of Louisiana—and it was to that part of Louisiana lying south of the Missouri to which he particularly referred—advantages far more important than those simply attendant on the uncontrolled navigation of the river and the unimpeded transportation to a market of the products of the Ohio Valley. His far-reaching mental vision foresaw the time when that vast alluvion lying between the Missouri and the sea should be reclaimed and dedicated to the purposes of industry; when its waste of sterile waters, its forests of cypress, its thickets of cane, should be converted into broad and fertile fields, teeming with wealth and populous with toiling millions. Perhaps, even, his ardent and patriotic fancy saw "the argosies of magic sails, pilots of the purple twilight, dropping down with costly bales," the product of a land rescued by the "blessings of freedom and of equal laws" from the dominion of the reptile and the beast and the empire of the waters. It was in such a condition of things attributed to a future which he cannot have believed to be very far distant that Mr. Jefferson foresaw "important aids to our Treasury" and an "ample provision for posterity." But, sir, three-quarters of a century have passed away since this prophecy was uttered, and the important aids to our Treasury have still only a potential existence. The mighty river maintains its empire, and the ample provision which Mr. Jefferson predicted for us is still that profusion of overflowing waters lavished upon us by the skies and mountains of far-off northern climes.

This, Mr. President, was not the entertainment to which the people of Louisiana were invited when this country was acquired by the United States. They justly and naturally had other expectations and other hopes—expectations and hopes destined thus far, I regret to say, to bitter disappointment. Governor Claiborne, of Louisiana, in his first address to the people of the Territory, dated December 20, 1803, (5 Am. State papers, p. 25,) says:

> You may, with equal certainty, rest assured that your commerce will be protected, and your agriculture cherished; in a word, that your true interests will be among the primary objects of national legislation.

It was natural that Governor Claiborne and the people to whom he addressed himself should cherish these hopes. They had good reason to believe that all the phenomena of the great river which had long been the object of international dispute, which had just been the object of international treaty and national acquisition, would be similarly and equally impressed with the national character. It never occurred to them to suppose that, concurrently with the national duties and the national control which were assumed, the equally national obligations would be repudiated or evaded.

Sir, the people of Louisiana, and I include in this the people of the other alluvial States, had no reason then to anticipate this repudiation or this evasion of national obligations, and they have no reason but that which is furnished by a long and sad experience to suspect it now. Is it still maintained that the Government has no power to undertake this great work; that it has no power to expend money for the fulfillment of these obligations, and for the proper administration and execution of the trust implied in the possession, the control, and the use of the river Mississippi? How can such a doctrine be maintained, Mr. President, in face of the constant practice of the Government during many years as to other interests and other objects which if national in their character for the purpose in question are national only by questionable implication? It is the practice of the Government to appropriate every year a sum of money for the support of the Signal Service. This money is appropriated and expended in the collection and dissemination of meteorological information, with incidental reference to the solution of scientific problems, and direct reference to the agricultural and commercial interests of the country. In order that the mariner may be forewarned of the coming storm and that the farmer may anticipate the impending rain, the Government takes on itself the expense of establishing signal stations, of employing observers, of collecting information, and of publishing the results. The benefits are great, it is true; the sum of money expended is small; but it is equally true that the Federal Government does the work, confers the benefit, and pays the money.

Under the power of regulating commerce, or that more elastic clause relating to the general welfare, or that other clause empowering Congress to do what may be necessary to give effect to its constitutional legislation, under one of these grants of power, or all of them, it is indifferent which, it has been the practice of the Government to levy high duties on foreign imports, ostensibly to raise a revenue, but in many cases really to favor certain special interests, call them national interests if you will, sir, to set in motion the looms of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, to develop the mines of Pennsylvania, to enrich the salt-boilers of New York, or to support a host of other industries which it is asserted would not, in default of these indirect bounties, be able to support themselves. This we are told is protection to American industry; and we are likewise told that protection to American industry not only belongs to the Federal Government as a right, but is incumbent on it as a duty. I do not intend to quarrel with these assertions; I shall not attempt to refute them. I do not say that the system is not a good one, nor for the present argument do I utter a word of criticism as to that policy, but I ask whether protection to American industry is not as much implied in the great work which I am advocating as in the system of bounties to the manufacturers of New England and the miners of Pennsylvania?

I ask you, sir, whether the national character of this work, relating as it does to a vast river, the navigable waters of which flow through eighteen States and Territories, is not more plainly discernible than the national character of a system which, as to its constitutionality, can be defended only by doubtful and untrustworthy inferences. Do the tariff laws protect and support industries amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars in capital invested? This may be conceded, sir, although, on the other hand, it may be argued that these industries would be more self-sustaining if freed from the influence and the artificial stimulus of protective legislation; but let it be conceded, and I answer that the application of a uniform and effective system of levees to the river Mississippi would protect interests and industries equally amounting to hundreds of millions of capital invested, industries and interests which cannot protect themselves, but which, without the intervention of this Government, will be forever exposed to ruin, and even annihilation. I have already given, Mr. President, a general statement of the extent and value of the improved lands and the amount and value of the products of those lands in the regions subject to overflow below the mouth of the Arkansas. I shall supplement this by a general view of the vast results which would spring from the adoption and completion of a uniform system of efficient levees from the mouth of the Ohio to the neighborhood of the sea. For this purpose I shall adopt the language of the report of Humphreys and Abbot:

> It may be well to exhibit, in connection with this approximate estimate of the cost of leveeing the alluvial region, the extent and probable value of the lands which, thus protected from overflow, will be rendered available for cultivation. The area of those lands from Cape Girardeau to Red River is 19,450 square miles. It may be assumed that one-half of this area will be rendered cultivable, and as its value per acre may be set down at $25 the total will amount to $150,000,000. The area of the alluvial land under cultivation below the mouth of Red River is not less than 1,000,000 acres, which, at $100 per acre, by no means an extravagant estimate, gives $100,000,000 for the value of the plantations in that section, making a total of $260,000,000 for the land that will be rendered perpetually cultivable by the expenditure of $17,000,000. There is another aspect under which this part of the subject may be presented. The number of acres thus protected is 7,000,000. Each acre of alluvial land will produce one bale of cotton, worth on the average $45. We thus have for the value of the annual product of the alluvial lands $315,000,000. The loss in the Tensas bottom from the flood of 1850 furnishes an instance of the injuries resulting from inundation. It was estimated that the loss thus occasioned exceeded $5,000,000.

The eminent authors of the report have understated the results because they have omitted from their calculation the waste lands which, by an efficient levee system, would be reclaimed below Red River. These would exceed in area the lands actually improved. Leaving this out of view, however, it will be seen that the effect of this great national work will be to protect an American industry which would very soon amount to an annual product of $315,000,000 and which would sustain itself without bounties, without a constant drain on other interests, and at the cost only of the small annual expense of keeping the levees in repair, by its peculiar, I may say its marvelous, adaptation to the soil and the climate of that region. When we shall have protected this vast industry by fulfilling our national obligations and assuming our national responsibilities; when we shall have fulfilled the just expectations so long disappointed and the reasonable hopes so long delayed; when we shall have done what justice and reason and morality and law alike require that we should do to develop the immense resources of that region too long forgotten and neglected; when we shall have converted this wilderness of waters into arable and cultivated fields and assured prosperity and happiness to the people who inhabit them, then, and not till then, shall we have discharged our duty; then, and not till then, shall we have completed our task and fulfilled the prophecy of Jefferson by extending the blessings of equal laws to all portions of our common country; then, and not till then, shall we have surpassed "the glory that was Greece, the grandeur that was Rome."

I have to apologize to the Senator from Vermont, who has so courteously allowed me a portion of his time, for detaining the Senate so long.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have certainly listened with a very great deal of pleasure to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. EUSTIS. I move that the bill be referred to the Select Committee on the Levees of the Mississippi.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 1308) to amend sundry provisions of chapter 1, title 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to presidential elections, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the consent of the Senate to take up the West Point appropriation bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will not insist upon that. Senators desire to speak on this bill and it is agreed that it shall be disposed of to-morrow. I hope the Senator will not press a bill which he knows will take time——

Mr. WINDOM. I know it will not take any length of time, and therefore I should like to pass it to-day; it will not take ten minutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The ten minutes will be just as good to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. WINDOM. I am afraid I shall not get them to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, you will.

Mr. WINDOM. The session is very short, and therefore I feel like asking the consent of the Senate to consider the bill at this time; and if it is not granted it is not my fault.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You will not lose anything by waiting until to-morrow.

Mr. WINDOM. We have two other bills ready that we want to have acted upon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They have not been reported.

Mr. WINDOM. They are ready.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are not ready until they are reported.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask consent of the Senate to take up the bill. If it is objected to of course I shall not press the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Vermont has already objected. Does the Senator from Minnesota move to lay aside the pending and all other orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the appropriation bill?

Mr. WINDOM. I will not press it against the wish of the Senator from Vermont and others. The Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] I believe, has the floor upon the electoral bill. But I will give notice to the Senate that before the adjournment to-morrow afternoon, after the electoral bill is acted on, I shall ask the Senate to give me a very few moments to consider the West Point appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the Senator from Delaware does not desire to go on to-day; and why not lay aside this bill informally and take up the appropriation bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It may be that somebody else desires to go on. Let us hear what the Senator from Delaware would like.

Mr. ALLISON. He wants to go on to-morrow morning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does no other Senator desire to speak this afternoon?

Mr. BAYARD. I suppose that the unfinished business for to-morrow will be the electoral-count bill, and that it will be called up at the expiration of the morning hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will come up at the expiration of the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. BAYARD. I shall at that time submit a few remarks to the Senate, and shall then have the floor, I presume, for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware will have the floor at that time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask if there is any Senator who desires to speak this afternoon upon the bill under consideration, being the electoral bill. If there be none, so that we shall certainly finish it to-morrow, as the unanimous understanding is, then of course I have no objection to my friend from Minnesota going on to-night with his appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will hear the request made by the Senator from Vermont. If there be any Senator who desires to occupy the floor upon the pending bill, he will be recognized by the Chair.

Mr. WINDOM. There seems to be none, and therefore I ask the Senate to take up the Military Academy appropriation bill, which will not require ten minutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The bill under consideration is to be laid aside informally, and to be the unfinished business to-morrow whether we finish the appropriation bill to-day or not.

Mr. WINDOM. Of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding of the Senate. The pending measure will be laid aside informally until the bill suggested by the Senator from Minnesota can be taken up and considered; and if that shall not be completed before the adjournment to-day, the electoral bill is to remain the unfinished business and to have precedence to-morrow.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I desire to say that I shall press the consideration of Senate bill No. 300, which is subject only to the electoral bill in charge of the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire propose to antagonize that bill against the bill which the Senator from Minnesota proposes to have considered?

Mr. WADLEIGH. No, I do not.

USE OF TROOPS.

Mr. PADDOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1492) to amend section 15 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 18, 1878; which was read the first time.

Mr. PADDOCK. The bill is a very, very short one and a very simple one, and one for the passage of which there is very great urgency. I shall call the attention of the Senate to it in a day or two, and I should be glad to have it read at length. It is very brief.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the provisions of the fifteenth section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 18, 1878, shall not be construed as applying to nor be enforced against the Army of the United States, or any part thereof, employed in the protection of life and property in the States and Territories subject to Indian incursions.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask that the bill lie on the table until to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You will not get it passed without a reference.

Mr. PADDOCK. Upon the assurance of my distinguished friend from Vermont that the bill will not pass without a reference, I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PADDOCK. I take occasion now to ask that committee to report the bill at the earliest possible moment.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. BURNSIDE, from the joint committee on the reorganization of the Army, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1491) to reduce and reorganize the Army of the United States, and to make rules for its government and regulation.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the bill be made a special order for the 8th of January next. It is a very important bill, and a great deal of labor has been expended on it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would be in a little worse condition when made a special order than without.

Mr. WINDOM. If the order is not to interfere with appropriation bills I shall not object.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I have no desire to interfere with the appropriation bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island has moved that the bill reported by the special commission upon the reorganization of the Army be made a special order for January the 8th next.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN W. CHICKERING.

On motion of Mr. SPENCER, it was Ordered, That 50 copies of the report on the bill (S. No. 1260) for the relief of John W. Chickering be printed for the use of the Committee on Military Affairs.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 5230) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. WINDOM. Before the bill is read let me say that the Committee on Appropriations have added but $2,700 to the bill as it came from the House. One thousand dollars of the addition is for the correction of an error with reference to the amount to be paid two professors. The committee have added $1,200 for a clerk to the treasurer, which I believe the treasurer has had heretofore until within a year or two, and $500 for a safe for the disbursing officer of the academy. These comprise the entire additions to the bill as it passed the House. I ask that the reading may proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota desire that the Senate shall act on the amendments as they are reached in their order?

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to have the amendments acted upon as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, which was reported by the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 8, before the word "professors," to strike out "two" and insert "four," and in line 9, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seven" and insert "fourteen;" so as to read:

For pay of four professors, at $3,500 per annum each, $14,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment was, in line 10, before the word "professors," to strike out "seven" and insert "five;" and in line 11, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-one" and insert "fifteen;" so as to read:

For pay of five professors, at $3,000 per annum each, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 77, to insert:

For clerk to treasurer, $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 78, to insert:

For safe for disbursing officer's office, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "dollars" in line 140, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That hereafter the expenses allowed the Board of Visitors shall be paid as follows: each member of the board shall receive not exceeding five cents per mile for each mile traveled by the most direct route from his residence to West Point, and five cents per mile for each mile from said place to his residence on return, and shall in addition receive $5 per day for expenses during each day of his service at West Point.

So as to make the clause read:

For expenses of the Board of Visitors, including mileage, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. MAXEY. I move as an amendment to the pending bill in line 107, after the word "dollars" to insert:

Apparatus for illustrating the science of electricity as applied to the useful arts, $3,000.

And in the same line, to strike out "one" and insert "four," so as to make the total $4,600.

In support of the amendment which I have proposed, I send to the Clerk's desk a letter from the professor of chemistry at West Point which I ask to have read. I will state that I have personally known the writer for thirty-six years; that he is thoroughly accomplished, and the recommendation which he makes may be relied upon implicitly by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

WEST POINT, N. Y., December 11, 1878.

MY DEAR MAXEY: I see that the Military Academy bill has been sent to the Senate minus the item asked for from here—$3,000 for the electric light, &c., as per the inclosed scrap.

It relates to a subject just now involving, as it will continue to involve, more scientific thought than any other before the world. Every scientific journal and all the newspapers, even, are discussing it. As a matter of expense it will result in real saving when once appropriated for.

Many colleges have the apparatus in question. If the Military Academy is to keep anywhere abreast of modern science in its every-day useful applications, this appropriation is essential.

I would be derelict to my duty if I should fail to make proper efforts in this matter.

Most truly, yours,

H. L. KENDRICK.

Gen. S. B. MAXEY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. MAXEY. I have only to add to what is so admirably and well said by the professor of chemistry, that the recent applications of electricity are of the utmost importance in my judgment; and if our national institution is to keep abreast with the colleges of the country it is but proper and right that we should commence now to teach the young men at West Point the due uses of electricity, and there is no better time to commence than now. The amount asked for is a mere trifle compared with the importance of the subject, and being recommended as it is by the professor of chemistry I hope that the Senate will agree to the amendment without objection.

Mr. WINDOM rose.

Mr. MAXEY. I should have stated to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that I would have laid the amendment before the committee before to-day, but I only received the letter this morning.

Mr. WINDOM. I was about to ask the Senator from Texas if it is estimated for by the Department. Is it estimated for in the regular estimates?

Mr. MAXEY. Yes, I think it was estimated for, but it was not acted upon by the House. The professor believes it to be so important that he desires to call the attention of the Senate to the fact, and his reasons are very accurately and well stated in the letter which has been read.

Mr. WINDOM. If the item is estimated for, I shall make no objection to it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not understand what the chairman of the committee says.

Mr. WINDOM. I asked the question, if this was in the regular estimates, and ascertaining that it is, I do not choose to resist it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Do I understand the chairman to say that it is estimated for in the regular estimates?

Mr. WINDOM. It is estimated for.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If the chairman of the committee makes no objection to it, I make none.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

The question being put, the Chair declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. BECK called for a division; which resulted—ayes 18, noes 4.

Mr. WINDOM. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BECK. There is such a majority in favor of the amendment that I withdraw the call for a division.

Mr. WINDOM. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BECK. Let it go.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question again on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BECK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eleven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 12, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SALARIES OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. VANCE, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial and petition of watchmen and laborers in Government Departments, praying to be restored to former salaries; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial and petition of attendants in model-room in Patent Office, praying to be restored to former salaries; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CLASSIFICATION OF MAIL MATTER, ETC.

Mr. GIDDINGS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5488) relating to the classification of mail matter and rates of postage thereor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN STARK.

Mr. SEXTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5489) for the relief of John Stark, United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MATTHIAS K. HAINES.

Mr. SEXTON also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5490) for the relief of Matthias K. Haines, United States steamer Volunteer; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM R. BENTLEY.

Mr. BICKNELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R No. 5491) for the relief of William R. Bentley; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ANNA E. HALLOWELL.

Mr. BICKNELL also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5492) for the relief of Anna E. Hallowell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

RENT OF UNITED STATES LAND OFFICES.

Mr. PAGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5493) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make allowance for rent of United States land offices; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH N. LEWIS.

On motion of Mr. COLE, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 308) for the relief of Joseph N. Lewis, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims, not to come back on a motion to reconsider.

JOHN THOMAS.

Mr. BRENTANO, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5494) granting a pension to John Thomas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM W. MORROW.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5495) granting relief to William W. Morrow; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM PURCELL.

Mr. McMAHON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5496) for the relief of William Purcell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EDWARD WELSH.

Mr. McMAHON also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5497) for the relief of Edward Welsh; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. SCHLEICHER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Railways and Canals, reported back the following, which were referred as indicated:

Remonstrance of citizens of California against a further extension of time to the Southern Pacific Railroad—to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, asking an extension of time in which to complete the Northern Pacific Railway—to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Remonstrance against limiting the transportation of live stock to a given number of hours, by dealers and shippers of live stock—to the Committee on Agriculture.

A memorial in reference to palace stock-cars—to the Committee on Agriculture.

ANNA BENTON.

Mr. JOYCE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5498) granting a pension to Anna Benton; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF HEALTH OFFICER OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Public Printer be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to print 1,500 extra copies of the report of the health officer of the District of Columbia for the use of said health officer.

UNITED STATES COMMISSIONER JOHN I. DAVENPORT.

Mr. WOOD. I rise to a question of privilege and offer a resolution directing an investigation into the conduct of Mr. Davenport, United States commissioner of New York. That resolution is based upon a petition which I will ask to have read. I offer the resolution as a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read and then the Chair will determine whether it is a question of privilege.

The preamble and resolution were read, as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that at the election held in the city of New York on the 5th day of November, 1878, United States Commissioner John I. Davenport, acting as chief supervisor of elections in the second judicial district of New York, was guilty of illegal, unjust, and oppressive exercise of pretended authority in causing the arrest and imprisonment of citizens innocent of offense, by which he deprived them of their rights to vote and subjected them to indignities, insults, and intimidation without warrant of law or justification, which arrests have since been declared illegal in a test case by a judge of the circuit court of the United States; and

Whereas if these allegations are true that officer should be forthwith removed and punished: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to proceed without delay to an investigation of the conduct of said Davenport at the time aforesaid, with power to sit in the city of New York by subcommittee or otherwise, and that said subcommittee shall have all the authority of the whole committee for said purpose, with power to administer oaths, to send for persons and papers, to sit during the sessions of the House, and to report at any time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I prefer that that resolution should lie over. I think it requires unanimous consent to give the committee leave to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] presented it as a question of privilege.

Mr. GARFIELD. It cannot be a privilege to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. If the resolution has the claimed privilege it will have the same on to-morrow as well as to-day.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will allow it to be printed, so that we can see the whole scope of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would inquire if this officer is confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. GARFIELD. I think not.

Mr. WOOD. He is a clerk of a court and a United States commissioner, clothed with power over elections. Therefore I think it is within the power of this House to make such a statement of his case as will lead to his removal from office. I do not think it at all material whether he is confirmed by the Senate or not.

The SPEAKER. It is a powerful auxiliary fact if he is confirmed by the Senate as to scope of jurisdiction by the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. The officer to whom this resolution refers is not an officer that ever appears for confirmation by the Senate. He is appointed under the statutes by a judge, and is in no sense an officer confirmed by the Senate and therefore impeachable. If this were a proceeding in impeachment, of course it would be a high question of privilege. But as I understand it, it is not a case that comes within the purview of impeachment.

Furthermore this resolution gives the power to report at any time, which power cannot be given except by unanimous consent. I do not wish to raise objection to the consideration of this resolution, but I ask the gentleman to let it be printed so that we may see what it is; and then it may possibly be that there will be no objection to it. I do object, however, that a manuscript resolution shall be adopted here without our having an opportunity to fully understand it.

The SPEAKER. The reason the Chair asked the question whether this officer is one who was confirmed by the Senate was that in all the discussions on this subject in both Houses, so far as the Chair recollects, it has been held that this is an important element in determining the question as to the liability of an officer to impeachment.

Mr. WOOD. I am surprised at the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] On the first day of the session he declared here very broadly that there would be no obstacle interposed by himself or his political friends to any investigation anywhere. Now, sir, we are in favor of investigation everywhere. If there has been any offense against the laws and the Constitution in any portion of the United States which it is within the power of Congress to correct, I hope that no one, especially upon a mere technical question of this character, will interpose the slightest objection.

I present this resolution in consequence of a long petition now in the hands of the Speaker, signed by most reputable citizens of New York, asking for this investigation. I am prepared to back up that petition by very many affidavits, fully sustaining every allegation put forward in this resolution. All that we ask is that this officer's conduct may be investigated; and I am surprised that the gentleman from Ohio should appear to place himself in opposition to such investigation.

Mr. BURCHARD. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me a moment?

Mr. BRIGHT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WOOD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BURCHARD. All that has been asked on this side of the House has been that there might be time given to look into this matter.

Mr. BRIGHT. The gentleman from New York yielded to me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee in a moment.

Mr. BURCHARD. All that has been asked on this side of the House is that time be allowed to look into this resolution. The gentleman from Ohio has not opposed the investigation. He asks that the resolution be printed and lie over that it may be examined. It has come suddenly upon the House. There is a question which suggests itself to me in regard to the frame of the resolution. It proposes that power be given to a subcommittee to administer oaths. Now, the law regulates that matter. This House cannot give power to administer oaths. The law provides that the chairman of a committee of this House may do so. This House may make a subcommittee a committee of the House, so that the chairman of the subcommittee will then by law have this power; but as the resolution is now framed it may be objectionable in that view. There may be other objections. We desire that the resolution lie over and be printed in order that it may be examined. Let it come up again to-morrow or at some future time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I want to say a word in reply to what the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] has said. He will see that I not only do not object to investigation, but, as I have frequently said hitherto, I want the largest and fullest investigation, not only into what he now alleges but into every similar allegation. But I do want to see the scope of this resolution before we are called upon to act on it, and I may also want to offer some amendment to it, which I cannot do until I have opportunity to examine the whole paper

Therefore, using my right to make the technical objection, I do make it, unless the gentleman will allow us to have the resolution laid over and printed for examination.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from New York that he would himself like the resolution to go over for a day to give the Chair opportunity to examine as to the point raised.

Mr. WOOD. If the Chair will permit me, I will say in reply to the gentleman from Ohio that if he will consent to have the resolution, the petition, and the affidavits which I hold in my hand all printed in the RECORD of to-morrow morning, and will consent to make this question the special order immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow, I will consent that the resolution lie over. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. GARFIELD. It is not necessary to have all these papers printed.

Mr. WOOD. Unless the proposition I have made be assented to, allowing the question to lie over may be equivalent to indefinite postponement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. WOOD. What, then, will be the effect?

The SPEAKER. If the resolution possesses the character of a question of privilege to-day it will not lose that character by lying over until to-morrow.

Mr. WOOD. But the gentleman from Ohio proposed to waive his objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. If this is a privileged question, the gentleman can call it up to-morrow morning.

Mr. WOOD. Will you aid me in calling it up to-morrow morning.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly I will.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be again read.

The Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. WOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker,——

The SPEAKER. The agreement, as the Chair understands, is that the resolution shall lie over. Even if a question of privilege, the question of consideration can be raised.

Mr. CONGER. Is this resolution liable to objection? I ask that it may be read. [Cries of "Too late!"] It cannot be too late. I ask that the resolution be read that I may hear it.

Mr. WOOD. The subject has been discussed by the House; and it is too late to raise any objection.

Mr. CONGER. It is not too late. The point of order, as I understand, has been reserved.

Mr. WOOD. I do not yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman from New York will include all cases of this class, I am perfectly willing the resolution should be adopted.

Mr. WOOD. I do not yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. When the resolution comes up it will be open to amendment, unless the House order the previous question, thereby cutting off amendments.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman from New York will not hear me a moment, I object to the resolution.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to know, Mr. Speaker, except on a question of order, who has the floor?

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen to the left of the Chair raised questions of order.

Mr. WOOD. The only point is whether what I have presented is a question of privilege or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Ohio to claim the right to object if it was not a question of privilege.

Mr. WOOD. I yielded to the gentleman from Ohio; I yielded to the gentleman from Illinois; I yielded to the gentleman from Tennessee; and I now claim the floor within my hour. I deny the right of the gentleman from Michigan to rise unless it may be a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The question of privilege has not been settled.

Mr. WOOD. It is a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not decided that it was a question of privilege.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The proposition, when it comes up, will be open to amendment, subject to previous question.

Mr. BURCHARD. The gentleman from Ohio has not withdrawn the point of order and the objection he makes. That objection is still pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Ohio to agree to withdraw his objection if the resolution were allowed to lie over.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is, if it were a question of privilege. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. I object to the gentleman from Ohio doing that.

The SPEAKER. That is a mode of running in and out that the Chair does not comprehend.

Mr. GARFIELD. If it is not a question of privilege it cannot be heard without unanimous consent. I ask that it be printed and go over, so we may see it.

Mr. BURCHARD. The point of order is still pending.

Mr. GARFIELD. The point I made was this: that it was not a question of privilege in the first place, because the officer named is not an impeachable officer, and therefore this is not a proceeding in impeachment, and cannot be; and in the second place, that the resolution empowers the committee to report at any time, which cannot be done without either unanimous consent or a two-third vote. I raised both those points, but I said to the gentleman from New York that if he would let this be printed, so we might see its scope, it might be there would be no objection to it; that we wanted to look at it; but if he persisted in going on with it now we should insist on our point of order, that it is not a question of privilege, nor can it be.

Mr. WOOD. In reply to that, I will agree with the gentleman from Ohio, provided that in the RECORD to-morrow the resolution and petition and affidavits sustaining the petition shall be printed. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that assent was given to what the gentleman from New York has just asked, with the exception of the affidavits.

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir; I do not object to the printing of the petition.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, no gentleman can give away the rights of other members on this floor by assenting to anything.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not allow any gentleman to be deprived of any right. It has not yet been decided whether this is a question of privilege or not, and the Chair himself would prefer to have it lie over until to-morrow so he can examine the subject. He does not wish to make any hasty decision.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is right.

The SPEAKER. There is no doubt it would be an impeachable offense against the man who appointed this officer, in the opinion of the Chair, and in that case would be a question of privilege; but whether it goes further than that is a question the Chair would prefer to look into with care and thoroughness.

Mr. THOMPSON. How would you impeach him?

The SPEAKER. This is a question which the Chair desires to examine. As the Chair has before stated, it is the right of any member to raise the question of consideration. It was so decided in the Peck case, and there was a similar decision in the Humphreys case, and the decisions, as the Chair understands, are all in harmony with said authorities.

Mr. CONGER. My objection to the introduction of the resolution goes over with the subject?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands the purpose of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. Then if it holds its place——

Mr. WOOD. As I understand, the subject goes over until to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so desires, as he wants to examine the subject thoroughly, whether privileged or not.

Mr. CONGER. I understand that nothing but the resolution goes into the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The resolution and petition, but not the affidavits.

Mr. CONGER. The petition must go to the petition-box?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the petition was read.

Mr. CONGER. I understand not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in error. It was not read, but the agreement seemed to be that the resolution and petition should be published in the RECORD.

Mr. CONGER. Then I say no agreement can bind members on this floor who are not parties to it, and I object to the introduction of that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will go over, and the Chair will be ready to decide to-morrow morning whether it presents a question of privilege or not. If it is not a question of privilege the gentleman will have the right to object. If it is a question of privilege he is not harmed in his rights in any way by the resolution going over.

Mr. CONGER. Then I object to the printing of the petition.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to report back from the Committee of Ways and Means the resolution fixing the day for adjournment over the holidays.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair has not yet decided whether the petition will be printed.

The SPEAKER. The petition will not be printed because objected to by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOOD. Does the gentleman from Michigan, on behalf of his friends, object to printing the petition?

The SPEAKER. He does for himself.

Mr. WOOD. I want the world to know it, that these gentlemen do not want investigation.

Mr. McCOOK rose.

The SPEAKER. The subject is not before the House.

Mr. McCOOK. I want to reply to my colleague, [Mr. WOOD.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have an opportunity hereafter.

ADJOURNMENT OVER THE HOLIDAYS.

Mr. WOOD. I report back from the Committee of Ways and Means the concurrent resolution referred to that committee fixing the day for the holiday adjournment, with an amendment.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That when the House adjourns on Saturday, the 21st instant, it stand adjourned until Monday, January 6, 1879.

The amendment of the committee was as follows:

Strike out "Saturday the 21st" and insert "Thursday the 19th;" also strike out "Monday, January 6," and insert "Wednesday, January 8;" so that the resolution will read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That when the House adjourns on Thursday, the 19th instant, it stand adjourned until Wednesday, January 8, 1879.

Mr. WOOD. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is first on the amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, Mr. SPRINGER, and Mr. HARTRIDGE called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 110, nays 136, not voting 45; as follows:

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. KNOTT. Would it be in order to move to amend the resolution by striking out Saturday, the 21st instant, and inserting Friday, the 20th?

The SPEAKER. The main question is operating. Such an amendment could be admitted by unanimous consent.

Mr. THOMPSON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The amendment could be reached by a motion to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. WOOD. If the House will permit me I desire to say that for many years the public business at this period of the session has not been in such a state of forwardness as now. Already four appropriation bills have been passed, and probably before to-morrow night there will be two more, making six appropriation bills passed before the vacation. Under the circumstances I think the public business will not suffer by agreeing to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. THOMPSON. I withdraw my objection to the gentleman from Kentucky being permitted to offer his amendment.

The question being taken on Mr. KNOTT's amendment to strike out "Saturday, the 21st," and insert "Friday, the 20th," there were—ayes 121, noes 58.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. STEELE. I demand the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only twenty-five members voting therefor.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. WOOD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution, as amended, was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to ask permission of the House to bring upon the floor Hon. Thomas White, a member of the House of Commons of the Canadian Parliament.

There was no objection.

GENEVA AWARD.

The House resumed the consideration of the regular order, being the bill (H. R. No. 4553) to provide for the further distribution of the moneys under the Geneva award.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. Mr. Speaker, not in the records of American legislation can there be found a question more grave and interesting and whose determination will be more potential in results than that presented by the majority and minority reports of the Judiciary Committee touching the disposition of the Geneva award. Unhappily, it is not a novel question. It has already been discussed in three Congresses, and the result hitherto reached has not been creditable to the American name.

For the first time, we now have a proposition that this whole question, all differences of opinion being held in abeyance, shall be submitted to a judicial tribunal, to be determined there according to the principles of equity, justice, and the law of nations. To rightly comprehend this question it is necessary to briefly state some of the facts out of which arose the controversy culminating in the treaty of Washington. It is well known that during our recent struggle for the preservation of the American Union the attitude of Great Britain was unfriendly; that the English government hastened to recognize the so-called Confederate States as a belligerent power; that aid and comfort were furnished to the confederacy; cruisers were built in English ship-yards and coaled in English harbors which committed depredations upon American commerce, sweeping away, as with a whirlwind, well-nigh the whole carrying trade of this country and subjecting our whole nation to incalculable loss—loss growing out of the prolongation of the war and the additional cost to which the people in consequence were subjected.

Pending that unparalleled struggle for existence our Government contented itself by simply presenting the claims of our citizens. While it asserted our rights violated, while it complained of the wrongs perpetrated, no effective efforts were made to secure the enforcement of the former or the redress of the latter.

When the war was ended, however, negotiations were at once instituted. While the American Government had forborne to do anything whereby England could be called to a rigid accountability for her conduct, there was nevertheless in the American mind a feeling of intense resentment. Animosities had been kindled between England and the United States. Bitter controversy raged for a series of years. But happily for the civilization of the nineteenth century, instead of having recourse to arms the intelligence and Christianity of these two great nations gained ascendency, and resort was had to the treaty-making power.

We had first the Johnson-Clarendon treaty, then the Johnson-Stanley treaty; and finally, these being rejected, a high joint commission, which assembled in this city in the spring of 1871 and whose proceedings culminated in that grandest achievement in the annals of diplomacy, the treaty of Washington. This adjustment was entirely satisfactory to the American people. The treaty embraced a declaration of regret on the part of Great Britain for wrongs committed, and also provided a mode whereby our claims against her could be definitely adjusted and paid.

That the House may understand the character of this treaty, in so far as those rules and conditions are concerned which affect this award, I will read an extract from the first article of the treaty of Washington found in Geneva Arbitration, volume 1, page 12:

Whereas differences have arisen between the Government of the United States and the government of Her Britannic Majesty, and still exist, growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generically known as the "Alabama claims;" and

Whereas Her Britannic Majesty has authorized her high commissioners and plenipotentiaries to express, in a friendly spirit, the regret felt by Her Majesty's government for the escape, under whatever circumstances, of the Alabama and other vessels from British ports, and for the depredations committed by those vessels:

Now, in order to remove and adjust all complaints and claims on the part of the United States, and to provide for the speedy settlement of such claims which are not admitted by Her Britannic Majesty's government, the high contracting parties agree that all the said claims growing out of acts committed by the aforesaid vessels, and generically known as the Alabama claims, shall be referred to a tribunal of arbitration to be composed of five arbitrators, &c.

This article indicates the origin of the claims. I will now read from article 6 of the same treaty, where will be found the rules by which a neutral government is bound:

ARTICLE VI.

A neutral government is bound—

First. To use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping, within its jurisdiction, of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or to carry on war against a power with which it is at peace; and also to use like diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise or carry on war as above, such vessel having been specially adapted, in whole or in part, within such jurisdiction to warlike use.

Secondly. Not to permit or suffer either belligerent to make use of its ports or waters as the base of naval operations against the other, or for the purpose of the renewal or augmentation of military supplies or arms or the recruitment of men.

Thirdly. To exercise due diligence in its own ports and waters, and, as to all persons within its jurisdiction, to prevent any violation of the foregoing obligations and duties.

The next article which contains matter germane to this subject is

ARTICLE XI.

The high contracting parties engage to consider the result of the proceedings of the tribunal of arbitration and of the board of assessors, should such board be appointed, as a full, perfect, and final settlement of all the claims hereinbefore referred to, and further engage that every such claim, whether the same may or may not have been presented to the notice of, made, preferred, or laid before the tribunal or board, shall, from and after the conclusion of the proceedings of the tribunal or board, be considered and treated as finally settled, barred, and thenceforth inadmissible.

Such is the character of the treaty and such are the rules by which the tribunal was bound in deciding upon its award. Now, what were the claims submitted to the tribunal by virtue of that treaty? On this subject we have information that is entirely accurate, found in the award itself, as will appear by reference to volume 1 of Papers relating to the Treaty of Washington, page 185:

1. The claims for direct losses growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes by the insurgent cruisers.
2. The national expenditures in pursuit of those cruisers.
3. The loss in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag.
4. The enhanced payments of insurance.
5. The prolongation of the war, and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion.

All of them were eloquently and learnedly urged by the American counsel. But, at the very outset, Great Britain strenuously objected to the consideration of what was known as the indirect claims. Negotiations were suspended. Communications were opened with the Government at Washington, and the government at London. Pending these communications, while awaiting an answer from these respective governments, the tribunal made a declaration that—

After the most careful perusal of all that had been urged on the part of the United States in respect to these claims they had arrived, individually and collectively, at the conclusion that these claims did not constitute, upon principles of international law applicable to such cases, good foundation for an award of compensation, or computation of damages between nations, and should, upon such principles, be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal in making its award, even if there was no disagreement between the two governments as to the competency of the tribunal to decide thereon. (Correspondence respecting Geneva arbitration, p. 152.)

The United States agent upon this declaration being made forwarded it to the Government at Washington; and what was the result? The agent received instructions from Secretary Fish that the determination was entirely acceptable to the Government of the United States; that—

The declaration made by the tribunal, individually and collectively, respecting the claims presented by the United States for the award of the tribunal for, first, the losses in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag; second, the enhanced payments of insurance; and, third, the prolongation of the war and the suppression of the rebellion is accepted by the President of the United States as determinative of their judgment upon the important questions of public law involved. The agent of the United States is authorized to say that, consequently, the above-mentioned claims will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, and may be excluded from all consideration in any award that may be made. (Protocol vi, p. 21, vol. 4, Geneva Arbitration.)

It will be seen that both governments acquiesced in this determination. Gentlemen will mark that these claims were then absolutely excluded from consideration by the tribunal at Geneva; in other words, they were in express terms withdrawn, and therefore could not have entered into any adjustment or any award thereafter made by the arbitrators.

It will also be found by reference to the award that subsequently, to wit, on the 27th of August, 1872, another class of claims were rejected, those called national expenditures in pursuit of cruisers. (See Papers, vol. 4, Treaty of Washington, page 43.)

Now, what did this action involve? Why, a complete rejection of four out of the five classes of claims, so that the only claims to be considered by the tribunal at Geneva were those for direct losses growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes by insurgent cruisers. These depredations were committed by a number of armed cruisers, eighteen in all, namely: Alabama, Florida, Shenandoah, Tuscaloosa, Clarence, Tacony, Archer, Retribution, Georgia, Sumter, Nashville, Tallahassee, Chickamauga, Sallie, Jefferson Davis, Music, Boston, and V. H. Joy.

Now, then, by reference to the treaty, article 7, it will be seen that it was the duty of these arbitrators to pursue each claim separately, to ascertain which particular vessel committed the depredations and which particular vessels were inculpated, if any, and as to which particular vessel England had been guilty of negligence and of a violation of her neutral duties.

Every step taken by these arbitrators, what the votes of the arbitrators were as to each vessel, will appear by reference to the award and decision published in volume 4, Treaty of Washington, page 49, et sequitur. Each particular claim was scrutinized with the utmost care, and it was finally decided by a vote of the arbitrators that the only vessels which were inculpated were the Florida, the Alabama, and their tenders, and the Shenandoah after leaving Melbourne.

So here we have the scope of duty decided upon by the tribunal. We have ascertained its precise jurisdiction; and that is, to determine the amount of damages sustained by American citizens by reason of the acts of the inculpated steamers, the Alabama, the Florida, and the Shenandoah after leaving Melbourne. All other claims have been carefully and positively excluded—not only decided upon adversely, but excluded from all consideration. Not only is it a fact that these claims had been absolutely excluded, but it was a determination at which the United States Government rejoiced; it was a determination that yielded unequaled advantages to this country as a neutral power.

In confirmation of the statement I have just made, I read from volume 2, Geneva Arbitration, pages 475 and 476. They are extracts from a letter written by Mr. Secretary Fish to General Schenck, then our minister, on the 23d of April, 1872, referring to the exclusion of the claims I have mentioned:

Neither the Government of the United States nor, so far as I can judge, any considerable number of the American people have ever attached much importance to these so-called indirect claims or have ever expected or desired any award of damages on their account.

Further:

In the correspondence I have gone as far as prudence would allow in intimating that we neither desired nor expected any pecuniary award, and that we should be content with an award that a state is not liable in pecuniary damages for the indirect results of a failure to observe its neutral obligations.

It is not the interest of a country situate as are the United States, with their large extent of sea-coast, a small Navy, and a smaller internal police, to have it established that a nation is liable in damages for the indirect, remote, or consequential results of a failure to observe its neutral duties. This Government expects to be in the future, as it has been in the past, a neutral much more of the time than a belligerent.

It is strange that the British government does not see that the interests of this Government do not lead them to expect or to desire a judgment on the "indirect claims," and that they fail to do justice to the sincerity of purpose, in the interests of the future harmony of the two nations, which has led the United States to lay those claims before the tribunal at Geneva.

And from what has already been said it will be clearly understood this nation expected no damages except those which have arisen from the depredations committed by the particular vessels found inculpated. Those damages necessarily belonged to these two parties, either to the owners of those vessels and cargoes, or to those who succeeded to their rights by operation of law, assignment, or otherwise. The Government holds the money as a trustee.

What did the Government do in the first instance, and which merely manifested its purpose to act in behalf of claimants whose rights I shall here urge? Citizens were invited to hand in their claims. Many had already been presented to the Government at Washington as early as 1872. They were forwarded by the Government at Washington to the government in England, and were there presented—claims from owners of those vessels and cargoes as well as from those who were subrogated to the rights of their owners—the underwriters. After the treaty had been signed, a further invitation was given to all citizens, in these words, dated September 22, 1875:

Citizens of the United States having claims against foreign governments not founded on contract, which may have originated since the 8th of February, 1853, will, without any delay which can be avoided, forward to this Department statement of same under oath, accompanied by the proper proof.

The modus operandi of presenting the claim, the voucher for the claim, are all set forth in the letter.

Another invitation was also issued bearing date, Washington, September 8, 1871. So it will be seen from the outset the Government was intent upon performing its duty with reference to the rights of certain citizens who had suffered by the depredations of confederate cruisers.

The Government, then, necessarily holds this award in trust. Its claims, so far as we suffered as a nation, were specifically disallowed, and we have the declaration of a Secretary of State to the effect our Government did not in reality desire any pecuniary award.

I would also call the attention of the House to the letter written by Hon. Caleb Cushing, one of our most distinguished jurists, and our counsel before the tribunal, bearing date October 17, 1872, just about the time the award was made and signed by the arbitrators:

The tribunal examined and scrutinized the estimates of the individual losses presented by the United States, and on the inspection thereof awarded a sum in gross which they believed to be sufficient, and which I think is sufficient to accord a just indemnity to injured citizens of the United States. This gross sum will within a year be paid by Great Britain to the United States with interest on any delay. It will be received and held by the United States as a trust fund to be distributed among parties interested, conformably to the tenor and spirit of the award of the tribunal, and the Government will be bound to make such distribution promptly and justly by the moral force of its duty of good faith to England and its obligations to fulfill the stipulations of the treaty of Washington.

Gentlemen have sneered at the idea that our Government could act as a trustee for these corporations. Why, sir, the Government never could act in a capacity so exalted as when it seeks the redress of wrongs which have been perpetrated on its citizens by a foreign government. And I am happy to say the odious doctrine that this money belongs to the Government of the United States is no longer urged by any committee in this House. I am happy to say even the minority report argues this money shall not be kept in the Treasury of the United States where there is so much more now than belongs to the Government. I rejoice also that in a former discussion on this subject the honorable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] who advocates so eloquently and so zealously a certain character of claims which were rejected by the tribunal of Geneva, denounces the act of covering this fund into the United States Treasury as nothing but the vilest piracy.

TO WHOM SHOULD THE MONEY BE PAID.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is conceded that if the money does not belong to the United States Government it must be held in trust for certain citizens of the United States for the payment of certain claims. It has been argued at great length hitherto, it is argued in the minority report, that for as much as this sum was paid to the United States in gross, therefore our Government is subject to no limitations so far as the disposal of that fund is concerned. Why, sir, nothing could be more mistaken, nothing can be further from the truth. The following instruction was given our counsel by Secretary Fish:

The declaration made by the tribunal, individually and collectively, respecting the claims presented by the United States for the award of the tribunal for, first, the losses in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag; second, the enhanced payments of insurance; and, third, the prolongation of the war and the suppression of the rebellion is accepted by the President of the United States as determinative of their judgment upon the important questions of public law involved. The agent of the United States is authorized to say that, consequently, the above-mentioned claims will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, and may be excluded from all consideration in any award that may be made. (Protocol vi, page 21, volume 4, Geneva Arbitration.)

Mr. Secretary Fish, when he insists that our commissioners shall make no committal as to the method of distribution, asserts nothing, decides nothing, and if he did, it would be an impertinence beyond his province and authority so to do, and hence of no effect.

But we have abundant evidence as to the reason why this sum was paid to the United States in gross. It will appear by reference to the American argument and also by reference to the award of the tribunal at Geneva. I refer to volume 1, page 189:

The American counsel earnestly hope the tribunal will exercise the power conferred upon it to award a sum in gross to be paid by Great Britain for injuries which the United States complain were committed many years since.

The original wrongs to the sufferers by the acts of the insurgent cruisers have been increased by the delay of making the reparation, and it will be unjust to impose further delay and the expense of presenting claims to another tribunal if the evidence which the United States have the honor to present for the consideration of these arbitrators shall prove to be sufficient to enable them to determine what sum in gross would be a just compensation to the United States for the injuries and losses of which they complain.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these are the reasons indicated which controlled the action of the tribunal at Geneva in arriving at the determination to make a payment of this sum in gross: for the convenience of suitors, to save the suitors from further expense, delay, and loss, and, furthermore, to exhibit toward the United States a generous trust and confidence that under its auspices the execution of the trust would be faithful and honest. Such are the reasons, the official reasons, why this money was paid in a gross sum. Why, sir, the idea that this payment in gross relieves the United States of any obligation with reference to the distribution of this fund is too preposterous to admit of argument. You will remember that the treaty itself provided that a board of assessors should be appointed, whose duty would have been to make provision for the payment of these claims after the tribunal had concluded its duties—a board of assessors appointed respectively by the Emperor of Brazil, by the King of Italy, by the President of the Swiss Confederation, by the President of the United States, and by the Queen of Great Britain. Does any one suppose that this board of assessors, had they been called upon to act, would have ignored the rules and limitations which had been prescribed by the treaty itself, by the tribunal which had provided for their appointment and given them their warrant of authority? Why, the idea is too ludicrous for serious consideration.

The fact that this payment was made in gross does not, as a matter of course, change the great underlying principle of this treaty. It does not in any wise affect the rights which grew out of that award and decision. The United States are in honor bound by the same rules and subject to the same conditions as though assessors had been appointed. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is conclusively established that this money is held by the United States as a trustee. Who, then, are the cestui que trusts? The parties whose claims were specifically allowed or the parties whose claims were specifically disallowed? That is the question presented by the two reports. These moneys rightfully belong to the owners of those vessels and cargoes which were destroyed by the inculpated steamers which are included in the statement of claims upon which the award itself was predicated, and which I shall append to my remarks. By reference to that table you can find the exact number of vessels that were destroyed, the value of each vessel, and each cargo; and the aggregate will indicate what, together with interest, constitutes the measure of damages agreed upon and the award made by the Geneva tribunal. The rights of the owners of these vessels and cargoes have been recognized in the determination already had and the payments already made. They have already received their moneys, and now I desire to find that man who has wisdom and acuteness in sufficient measure to distinguish between the rights of those men who owned those vessels and the men who by virtue of subrogation succeeded to them in their rights. Who can distinguish between the rights of the assignor and those of the assignee? I have read many arguments in the several debates held in different Congresses, and I have not yet found a plausible reason assigned why the underwriters should be denied the payment of their claims.

The decisions on this subject in England and in this country alike constitute an unbroken array. I will cite Gracie vs. New York Insurance Company, (8 Johnston Reports, 237,) in which Chief-Justice Kent says:

If France should at any future period agree to and actually make compensation for the capture and condemnation in question, the Government of the United States, to whom the compensation would in the first instance be payable, would become trustee for the party having the equitable title to the reimbursement; and this would clearly be the defendants (who are the insurers) if they should pay the amount.

I cite next Comegys vs. Vasse (1 Peters United States Reports, 193,) a case precisely similar so far as the principles of it are concerned, a case of marine insurance where a loss was paid to the owners of the vessel, and the character of the defendant's ownership (he being an underwriter) was decided. Chief-Justice Story says:

The law gives to the act of abandonment to underwriters, when accepted, all the effects which the most accurately drawn assignment would accomplish. The underwriter then stands in the place of the assured, and becomes legally entitled to all that can be recovered from destruction. It is clear that the right to compensation for damages and injuries to which citizens of the United States were entitled, and which, under the treaty with Spain, were to be subjects of compensation, passed by abandonment to the underwriters upon property which had been seized or captured.

Then, again, I quote from an argument made by Daniel Webster before the Supreme Court, in which he said, in reference to this very principle:

There is no more universal maxim of law and justice throughout the civilized and commercial world than that an underwriter who has paid a loss on ship or merchandise to the owner is entitled to whatever may be received from the property. His right accrues by the very act of payment; and if the property or its proceeds be afterward recovered in whole or in part, whether the recovery be from the sea, from captors, or from the justice of foreign states, such recovery is for the benefit of the underwriter. Any attempt, therefore, to prejudice these claims on the ground that many of them belong to insurance companies or other underwriters is at war with the first principles of justice.—Webster's Works, volume 4, page 156.

Such authorities are certainly beyond the reach of assault; the doctrine they enunciate has never been contradicted in any court, and has never been questioned, to my knowledge, save in this House.

I present also the following authorities in support of my position on this question: Rhinelander vs. Ins. Co. of Pennsylvania, 4, Cranch, U. S., 29; Symmonds vs. Union Ins. Co., 4, Dallas Rep. 417; Hall & Long vs. Railroad Companies, 13 Wallace, 367; Randall vs. Cochran, 1 Vesey, sr., 98; Quebec Fire Ins. Co. vs. Saint Louis, 7 Moore, P. C., 286.

Further, Mr. Speaker, this doctrine was also admitted in the British case presented before the tribunal, as the following extract shows:

COUNTER-CASE OF GREAT BRITAIN.

The American insurance companies, who have paid the owners as for a total loss, are, in our opinion, entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the latter, according to the well-known principle that an underwriter who has paid, as for a total loss, acquires the rights of the assured in respect to the subject-matter of insurance. This principle was explained and acted on in the well-known English cases of Randall vs. Cochran (1 Vesey, sr., 98,) and The Quebec Fire Insurance Company vs. Saint Louis (7 Moore, P. C., 286,) and is well recognized by the courts of America.

On the other hand, it is equally clear that the underwriters cannot be entitled to anything more than the assured themselves; for the claim of the former is founded on nothing else than their title to be subrogated to the rights which the latter possessed, and which therefore cannot possibly be more extensive than the claim which the latter would be entitled to maintain.

From these considerations two consequences follow: in the first place, where the claimant is the insurance company and not the owners, compensation cannot be due for any sum exceeding the amount of the actual loss sustained by the owner, however much that sum may fall short of the amount paid by the company by reason of the property having been overinsured. In the second place, wherever the owner puts forward a claim for his loss at the same time that the insurance company also claims the money paid by them in respect to the same loss, such a double claim must at once be absolutely rejected, since to allow it would be in effect to sanction the payment of the loss twice over.

Sir Roundell Palmer especially declared that the underwriters had claims which their government was bound to respect and to which they were justly entitled. Now it is established—

First. That the government is a trustee.

Second. That these underwriters are among its cestuy que trusts.

Third. That an absolute right has arisen in favor of these insurance companies, which it is not in the power of Congress to divert or divest them of without grossly violating the fundamental law.

And what, pray, is urged against the enforcement of these rights? Why are insurance companies to be condemned as enemies to society, as foes to the well-being of our people? Why, sir, were it not for these marine insurance companies, were it not for their immense cap ital, for the sagacity and wisdom exemplified in their management, what little commerce remained to us at the termination of the war would have been swept from the seas.

It occurs to me that where the absolute right exists, where damages have been conclusively proven, where it has been ascertained that these underwriters are cestuy que trusts, it is impertinent for any gentleman on this floor or elsewhere to discuss what their profits were. The question is not what they lost by their general business, which included risks inland on the lakes and on the rivers and along our coasts as well as those war premiums on account of which claims are here instituted and urged. The question is what the insurance companies lost by these particular depredations for which England was culpable and therefore responsible. That is the question, a legal proposition which gentlemen cannot shun.

Nobody will dispute this. If these particular eighty-nine vessels which were insured and which were destroyed by the inculpated steamers, the Alabama, the Florida, and the Shenandoah, had not been wrongfully destroyed by British negligence, by British violations of neutral rights and duties, then the moneys paid out for losses by insurance companies would have remained in the coffers of their companies. That particular amount of money, I say, is a distinct loss, absolutely proven, and belongs to the underwriters. And if the losses had not occurred and been paid in manner stated, no award of damages could have been made. What was the contract between the insured and the insurer? The insurer said to the assured: If I indemnify you, if I pay your loss, then I insist that it is not only in consideration of the premium, but also in consideration of what is known in legal parlance as the spes recuperandi—the hope of recovery.

Now, the insurance companies in pursuance of this contract paid these losses, and they insist upon the observance of the contract on the part of the insured or the party who represents the insured. In other words, they insist that this assignment shall be made good and respected by this House as it was by the tribunal at Geneva. And when the man who paid these enhanced premiums comes into this Congress or before the high court appointed for the distribution of this fund and insists that his contract with the underwriter shall be set aside and that he shall have these moneys which have been paid especially for the indemnity of the underwriter, then he insists upon an infamy which, if the views of the minority are crystallized into a statute, this Congress will countenance and applaud.

Gentlemen who declaim so brilliantly and vehemently about the gorged insurance companies that became so immensely wealthy, not because they violated any law, not because they pursued a course contrary to public policy, but simply because their affairs were managed with sagacity and discretion—I say the gentlemen who declaim against them are repeating simply the argument of the British counsel. Refer to the British case and there will be found everything that is venomous, everything that is slanderous which has been said in reference to the insurers in this House.

If the insurance companies did make large profits, if the insurance companies despite their losses did become gorged, that is not a matter of complaint by the American Congress. It belongs rather to England, who paid over the money that these insurance companies might be indemnified, to make the complaint. They are paid with English—not American—money. I will not say that gentlemen who represent the minority view are guilty of plagiarism when they repeat the same "stale, flat, and unprofitable" arguments against the insurance companies. But it is a coincidence most startling when those arguments are reproduced in shape, substance, and spirit precisely the same.

And the minority report goes still further, and in their assault upon the rights of the underwriter they borrow quotations from the London Times. It has come to this, that American legislators in the exercise of their sworn duties are to be controlled by the opinions of English counsel and English newspapers, and that, too, in a case already adjudicated adversely to England.

Here is an absolute right of which the underwriter cannot properly, cannot legally or constitutionally, be deprived. I say again, if anybody has a right to complain against the claims of the insurance companies it is England, the owner of the money, and not the United States, who holds it in trust for a specific purpose.

Sir, if these gentlemen opposed to claims of underwriters are honest, if they do really admire that proverb "that a false balance is an abomination to the Lord," then let them return this money to Great Britain. If we wrongfully secured it on the ground that the insurance companies were entitled to it when in fact they were not, then the money should be paid back into the English exchequer. That is honesty; that is what we have a right to expect from the champions of equity and justice.

But they do nothing, they propose nothing, of this character. They rather insist that the United States having secured this money by introducing certain character of proof, having obtained the money by using these tables furnished by underwriters, they will pay it to whomsoever they like; they will even pay it to the claimants of enhanced premiums of insurance and to those who suffered damage by the exculpated cruisers. In other words, they will pay claims which the United States positively agreed in that high court of nations, the most dignified that ever assembled on earth, that they would not insist upon and which they withdrew from consideration.

But why are we to pay these claimants of enhanced premiums? Because they were self-sacrificing patriots; because they were the men, forsooth, who kept the stars and stripes waving over the seas during the hour of our trial when our existence was imperiled. It is to be paid them as a reward for their disinterested patriotism. Why, sir, we should induce the gentleman from Chicago [Mr. HARRISON] to secure the services of the Marine Band that it may discourse sweet music in the corridor of the Capitol and celebrate the glories of these patriotic men. Surely they are altogether too good to live, especially in poverty. When these claimants paid war premiums the thought of profit never entered in their thoughts. They were not as other men are.

We are not informed by this accommodating minority report whether the claimants for damages committed by exculpated cruisers are patriots or not; but however this may be, there is one thing we do understand, and it is, that their claims were specifically disallowed.

Why, Mr. Speaker, what is the mercantile view of this discussion? How does this question of morality address itself to the mercantile mind? Here is a firm who paid enhanced premiums of insurance and who forwarded their claims for the same to the Department at Washington, which forwarded it afterward to the Government of Great Britain. This firm wrote a letter in which they disclaimed under the circumstances to receive the money belonging to the insurance companies. This is what they said:

> After the decision of the Geneva board of arbitration, disallowing the claims for war premiums, we supposed that all chance of our recovering anything for those claims was ended, and the idea of making an allowance to claimants of this character, by means of taking away from the insurance companies the amounts allowed by the Geneva board in satisfaction of their direct claims for losses of ships and cargoes vested in them as assignees, by abandonment or otherwise of the claims of the original parties, is an idea which certainly never would have occurred to us.

The writers of this letter, containing an avowal of sentiments so honorable, so exemplary, and instructive, are Grinnell, Minturn & Co., of New York City.

How fortunate if the House of Representatives in its action on this measure shall reflect the best virtue and intelligence of the American people!

Now, gentlemen, let me apply another test by which the validity of these war-premium payments can be gauged. Supposing that there had been no losses, that no damage on our commerce had been inflicted by the inculpated steamers; suppose the underwriters' claims had not been referred to that tribunal, what would the award have been? Most respectfully I invoke an answer. I ask any man who advocates these rejected claims that were excluded and disallowed, to tell me how any award would have been made unless the underwriters had presented their claims and unless damages had been inflicted by the inculpated steamers? Why, sir, the mere presentation of this proposition exposes the fraud and emptiness of the claim. There would have been no liability, and consequently no judgment, no award.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I move that the gentleman from New York be allowed to proceed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. I am obliged to the House for this courtesy. Mr. Speaker, the moment that we depart from the rules prescribed by the tribunal at Geneva that moment all metes and bounds disappear. We are in chaos. Why, sir, if we are to pay every man who suffered indirect loss from these depredations we must indemnify every citizen of the Republic. We must indemnify every man who was engaged in the ship-chandlery business; we must indemnify every man who was engaged in the building or repair of vessels; for assuredly the business of these men was destroyed by these cruisers. We should also indemnify the thousands of soldiers who were wounded in the war during that period for which it was prolonged by reason of the unfriendliness and negligence of Great Britain.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another phase of this question which presents itself to us more important than that which affects the rights of the claimants to this fund. It is a question as to what the effect of our action may be upon our rights as a neutral power in the future. It is well known—it has been asserted in the letters of Secretary Fish which I have read—that there was no desire on the part of our Government to receive a pecuniary award. It has been stated that this Government, by reason of the rules established by that tribunal, acquired great advantages as a neutral power. Now it will be understood whether America is willing or not to abide by the rules of that tribunal; whether, for the sake of gratifying these claimants who present themselves so vociferously at the bar of this House for the enhanced premiums of insurance and for losses that were inflicted by exculpated steamers, we shall abandon all these inestimable advantages as a neutral power, and, beyond this, violate our integrity as a people. And when Europe shall be embroiled in war, when two of those great nations shall be at enmity with each other and America seeks to avail herself of these advantages, it will be in the power of Great Britain, or of France, or of Russia, to say to us, "You accepted this money, agreeing to dispose of it according to the terms and conditions of the decision and award; but, having received it under false pretenses, you violated your obligations; you disregarded the spirit and tenor of the treaty; you recognized claims and liabilities which were decided adversely upon by that tribunal, it is true, but it is a precedent; and we insist, therefore, that you shall be bound by it, and shall not exercise those rights as a neutral to which you would have been entitled had that trust been honestly executed." In other words, this monument of statesmanship, this great achievement of diplomacy, the treaty of Washington, which was the first step toward the brotherhood of nations, is to be torn down and trampled on by this Republic. I cannot believe that such a shameful consummation will ever be reached by this House.

Now, gentlemen, what does the majority report contemplate? It is entirely harmless. It decides nothing; commits the House to nothing. It simply asks that these claims shall be referred to a judicial tribunal, to be there determined according to justice, equity, and the laws of the nations, a tribunal where appliance can be had for ascertaining the real facts which relate to each particular claim; where the law can be quietly and properly examined and just results reached.

What reason is there why this matter should not be referred to such a tribunal? Why, sir, nobody can object to this reference. Nobody can object to the Congress of the United States renouncing a function which does not legitimately belong to it and imposing it upon a co-ordinate branch of the Government well calculated for its exercise by reason of its composition, position, and experience in such a sphere of duty. There can be no objection to it; and no man, no claimant, will be heard in protest against it unless he believes that justice will defeat him, that equity will frown upon him, that the law of nations will undo him. There can be no other reason to urge why this measure referring all questions to a judicial tribunal should be defeated.

Once again I say that our action touching the distribution of this award is awaited with deep concern, not only by our own people, but by the representatives of foreign governments. The conclusion reached by us will be hailed either as a voucher that a government of the people can fulfill its international and treaty obligations, or as a sure proof that a republic has not virtue enough to keep faith either with its own people or with foreign governments; that the people who dwell in the land of Washington could stoop to a dishonor which would not be tolerable in the Sultan of Turkey or the Ameer of Afghanistan. Once more I say, let us, waiving our differences, quietly, in obedience to discretion, to prudence, and to justice, remand this whole question to the courts, where these cases will have precedence upon the calendar; where a prompt adjustment can be had; where a conclusion will be reached creditable to our civilization, worthy of our nationality, and just to all parties concerned.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration may be regarded as one of the most important appropriation bills to be acted on at the present session. The questions to be decided by this House are without precedent, as the causes of the injuries complained of by the citizens of the United States are themselves without precedent in the history of the Government.

The case so often quoted in this discussion, the case of Gracie vs. New York Insurance Company, furnishes no criterion whatever by which to determine the questions arising here. That was a case by a party insured upon an open policy of insurance upon the ship Vermont, if I recollect aright, which had been seized by the authority of the government of France. All that is said in that case upon the question of subrogation by Justice Kent, who wrote the prevailing opinion, was entirely obiter. No such point was involved in the case; and although the doctrine advanced by Judge Kent may be applicable in individual cases, it can of necessity have no application whatever to the complicated questions which arise upon the state of facts growing out of which the award known as the Geneva award was made.

How have these questions arisen, Mr. Speaker? Upon what state of facts are they predicated? At the outbreak of our great civil conflict the government of Great Britain at once recognized the belligerency of the confederates. The proclamation of the Queen was issued upon the 13th of May, 1861, less than a month after the firing upon the flag at Fort Sumter. At that time the confederacy had not a flag afloat upon the ocean nor a ship built anywhere. The blockade of our ports prevented her putting any vessels afloat. And the effect of this proclamation of the Queen, or of the British government, was not only greatly to impair the credit of the nation then struggling to obtain the means with which to prosecute the war, but its direct effect was to lead to the creation of ships of war for the purpose of preying on the commerce of the United States. Accordingly, on the 22d of March, 1862, the Florida, built as the Oreto, sailed from Liverpool, and was the first of the confederate cruisers which began to prey on our commerce. It continued afloat until the month of October, 1864, when it was seized in the harbor of Bahia by a United States steamer.

During this period the Florida destroyed thirty-six vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, the estimated value of which was about $3,000,000.

The next ship which set sail from Liverpool was the Alabama. It sailed from that port on the 15th of May, 1862. It kept on its piratical course until the month of June, 1864, when it was sunk in the ocean by the well-directed fire of Captain Winslow from the guns of the Kearsarge, having destroyed about seventy vessels, valued at something over $5,000,000.

The next vessel which went out was the Georgia, which was built at Dumbarton, on the Clyde, and sailed on the 2d of April, 1863. This was afloat until it was seized in August, 1864, having captured and destroyed only nine vessels, the estimated value of which was $332,000.

The next and last ship which sailed was the Shenandoah, or Sea King, which left London on the 8th of October, 1864, and arrived at Melbourne, on the 25th of January, 1865. During this period, the Shenandoah captured nine vessels, the last of which was the bark Delphine, on the 29th of December, 1864. The Shenandoah was manned in part, when she set sail, with the same men who were rescued from the Alabama as she was sinking in the ocean. From Melbourne she sailed to the North Pacific and destroyed about thirty whalers. The value of the vessels destroyed by the Shenandoah in all aggregates about four and a half million dollars.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the effect of this vast destruction of property and of the great peril to the rest of American shipping was unlike anything of which we have a precedent in history. It furnished a new and general business for the insurance companies in the opening of accounts for war risks or war premiums. It operated to effect a transfer of our merchant vessels to the protection of the British flag and almost annihilated our commerce in American ships. It compelled the owners of such vessels as refused to transfer them to the British flag to pay the large war premiums exacted by the insurance companies. It prolonged the prosecution of the war. It greatly imperiled, as I have said, the credit of the nation, and resulted in what have been properly termed in this discussion direct and indirect damages to the Government and citizens of the United States.

The Government insisted from the first that Great Britain was responsible for all these injuries, national and individual, direct and indirect, and after protracted correspondence and negotiations the Johnson-Clarendon treaty was first signed in January, 1869. This treaty provided only for the adjustment of claims of the citizens of the United States suffering loss by the operation of the confederate cruisers and excluded all national claims of every description.

In the then temper of the public mind a treaty so narrow as that was rejected by the Senate of the United States with only one dissenting vote in its favor. Negotiations from the time of the rejection of that treaty in the winter of 1869 were suspended until the fall of the year 1869. They were then renewed and were kept up at intervals until the fall of the year 1870. In his annual message to Congress in that year the President of the United States addressed this recommendation to Congress:

> I regret to say that no conclusion has been reached for the adjustment of the claims against Great Britain, growing out of the course adopted by that government during the rebellion. The cabinet of London, so far as its views have been expressed, does not appear to be willing to concede that Her Majesty's government was guilty of any negligence, or did or permitted any act during the war by which the United States has just cause of complaint. Our firm and unalterable convictions are directly the reverse. I therefore recommend to Congress to authorize the appointment of a commission to take proof of the amounts and the ownership of these several claims on notice to the representatives of Her Majesty at Washington, and that authority be given for the settlement of the claims by the United States, so that the Government shall have the ownership of the private claims, as well as the responsible control of all the demands against Great Britain.

Now, sir, it is easy to see, if time had permitted and this policy of the Administration had been carried out and the private claims had been purchased by the Government of the United States, that would have settled all the controversies which are now pending before us; and whatever sum had been awarded to the Government or whatever sum the Government chose to accept would have been the absolute property of the United States, without any condition, express or implied, imposed upon it.

In accordance with this recommendation of the President a bill was introduced into the House of Representatives providing a commission to determine the damage to citizens of the United States for the acts of the Florida, the Alabama, the Georgia, the Shenandoah, and their tenders; in other words the contemplated action of Congress under that recommendation of President Grant embraced every description of claim which had been presented on the part of citizens for damages by all the confederate cruisers and their tenders; and if the recommendation had been carried out, unquestionably a satisfaction would have been made by the Government of every claim of every description which has since been made upon this fund.

Early in the winter of 1871, not long after this recommendation and the introduction of the bill to which I have referred, negotiations were again opened between the two governments, and the prospect of success was such that the proposed legislation to enable the Government to acquire the title to these claims was abandoned.

The result was the joint high commission and the treaty of Washington, and the tribunal thereby created finally awarded a gross sum of fifteen and one half million dollars, to be paid in one year from the date of the award. This sum was awarded—and I beg the attention of the members of this House to the language—this sum was awarded as the indemnity to be paid by Great Britain to the United States "for the satisfaction of all the claims referred to the tribunal;" and the tribunal also in express terms declared:

> That all the claims referred to in the treaty as submitted to the tribunal are hereby fully, perfectly, and finally settled, whether the same may or may not have been presented to the notice of or made, preferred, or laid before the tribunal.

In other words, this sum of fifteen and one-half million dollars was designed by the arbitrators at Geneva, was designed by the action of the two governments, as a complete acquittal of the British government from every description of liability or complaint for the action of any of its vessels or of the vessels fitted out in its ports, whether what are termed the inculpated or the exculpated cruisers. For great national ends, and in the exercise of its sovereignty as to the treaty-making power, the Government assumed to do this act. At the same time, while inviting an award in gross, and, as I said, almost pleading for it, the Government was careful that there should be no commitment whatever on the part of the United States as to the disposition to be made of this fund or of any fund which might be awarded by the tribunal at Geneva. The instructions were thus explicit:

> The President desires to have the subject discussed as one between the two governments; and he directs me to urge upon you strongly to secure if possible the award of a sum in gross. In the discussion of this question and in the treatment of the entire case you will be careful not to commit the Government as to the disposition of what may be awarded, or what may be recovered in the event of the appointment of the board of assessors mentioned in the tenth article of the treaty. It is possible that there may be duplicate claims for some of the property alleged to have been captured and destroyed, as in the cases of insurers and insured. The Government wishes to hold itself free to decide as to the rights and claims of insurers upon the termination of the case.

What, then, becomes of the argument of the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] who has just resumed his seat that this award is a judgment in favor of the insurance companies? It is little else than mockery to claim to treat it as such. The instruction proceeds:

> If the value of the property captured or destroyed be recovered in the name of the Government, the distribution of the amount recovered will be made by this Government without committal as to the mode of distribution. It is expected that all such committals will be avoided.

Now, language could be no more explicit than the language I have quoted to show that the design of the United States in obtaining the award of this sum as an indemnifying award, as a fund of indemnity, was to reserve full and complete power and control over the distribution of the fund. While it is true that the Government has received this money as its own and has the absolute legal title to it, yet the extract which I have just read clearly contemplates that it is an indemnity fund, to be distributed among those who suffered by the acts of the confederate cruisers, and upon principles of equity as broad as the claims for injuries which were satisfied by the payment of the money.

Upon no other principles than these, and in no other view than this, that the equities of the claimants of this fund are as broad as the claims which were discharged by its payment, can the obligation resting upon the Government of the United States be properly performed. The Government is not strictly or technically a trustee. But there results from the circumstances under which this money was paid to the Government and received by it an obligation to do justice to the sufferers by the acts of the confederate cruisers, and of all the confederate cruisers; to do justice to the men who suffered upon the high seas as a consequence of the war.

In the early part of the negotiations Lord Stanley, writing to Sir Frederick Bruce, used this language:

> The real question at issue is the liability of the British government to make good the losses occasioned to American commerce by the operations of confederate ships of war in which British subjects are alleged at some time or other to have had more or less interest, and which in their character of confederate ships of war were at different times admitted into ports of Her Majesty's dominions.
>
> The real matter at issue between the two governments, when kept apart from collateral consederations, is whether, in the matters connected with the vessels out of whose depredations the claims of American citizens have arisen, the course pursued by the British government and by those who acted under its authority was such as would involve a moral responsibility on the part of the British government to make good, either in whole or in part, the losses of American citizens?

This fund having been awarded to indemnify sufferers, there is a like moral obligation resting upon the Government of the United States to apply it equitably and justly for the purposes for which it was obtained. There is an obligation resting upon the Government of the United States to so make distribution as to compensate those who suffered, and not to furnish enormous gains to any one. It was not designed to build up the fortunes of those who expected to make gains by their operations during the war.

Now I humbly submit this distribution should be made without reference to the opinions expressed by the members of the tribunal at Geneva, without reference to the question whether the injuries were caused by the inculpated or the exculpated cruisers.

I have shown you that the Sea King or Shenandoah destroyed nine vessels before reaching Melbourne, the last of which was the bark Delphine, burned on the 29th of December, 1864. With full knowledge of her piratical course from the time she sailed until that act of destruction and until she reached Melbourne, with the full knowledge of the fact that she had already destroyed nine vessels, under what circumstances and in what manner was she received at that port?

I quote from the statement of Mr. Hunt, the master's mate of the vessel, a much better description than I could give in any language of my own, even if I had been an eye-witness of what took place:

> That tarry in Melbourne was one of the bright reminiscences of our adventurous cruise round the world. I do not suppose so much hospitality ever was or ever will be shown to another ship in that port, and there were few, if any, who sailed in the Shenandoah who will not carry to their grave many pleasant memories of the days they spent on the shores of Australia.
> Until the end of our sojourn in Australia it was one continuous fête. Every place of public amusement was not only open to us, but our presence was earnestly solicited by the managers thereof, probably because we were curiosities and drew well. Balls, soirées, and receptions followed in such rapid succession that the memory of one was lost in another, and, in brief, we were so persistently and continually lionized that we were in serious danger of becoming vain, and taking the glory to ourselves instead of placing it to the credit of the cause for which we labored.
> * * * * * * *
> More than seven thousand people passed over the railroad from Melbourne to Sandridge, en route for the Shenandoah, one Sunday, besides hundreds of others who came by other modes of conveyance.

Now, with full knowledge, I say, of her piratical course up to the time she came to Melbourne she was thus received; she was refitted, for she was unfit to go into arctic waters; she was recoaled, and she was supplied with additional men and left Melbourne on the 18th of February, 1865, for the Northern Pacific Ocean.

Now, what was the work done by this vessel there? As I have already said she destroyed nearly thirty whalers after leaving Melbourne. On the 28th of June, 1865, she came in sight of ten whalers in a group. As a device to relieve them from apprehension, the Stars and Stripes were raised at the mast-head, and thus lulled into security these ten whalers remained quiet until they found themselves directly under the guns of the Shenandoah with the confederate flag substituted for the flag of the Union. They fell an easy prey. Two of them were employed as transports for the crews of the ten. The other eight were set on fire, and the Shenandoah anchored at a safe distance to watch the conflagration. She remained there at anchor until the charred hulks of these eight whalers went hissing down to the bottomless depths of the sea. That was done after it was known on board the Shenandoah that President Lincoln had been assassinated and that Richmond had fallen into the hands of the Union Army.

Now, I ask any man on this floor who loves justice and believes in right, to answer me this question. Upon what principle shall you allow the owners of these ten whalers or insurance companies having insured them, if they paid for the loss, to be paid for their destruction, while the owner of the bark Delphine, the last vessel destroyed by the Shenandoah before she reached Melbourne, is to go uncompensated for the loss and injury which he sustained?

If it be possible by any act of recognition to adopt the character of a wrong-doer and a trespasser, that was done in the case of the Shenandoah. And the case of the bark Delphine is simply a type which enables us, if we desire to be just and to do what is right, to see what class of sufferers by the exculpated cruisers shall be compensated out of the remainder of this fund.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, the award at Geneva was in no sense an adjudication as to the individual rights of any person. It was made expressly otherwise, and in gross for the indemnity of all for losses sustained by the acts of the confederate cruisers. It is in no sense a judgment. It is the result of an exercise of the treaty-making power in the interest of peace for the future security of neutrals; and the fact that it was reached by the intervention of arbitrators does not change the result.

If the Government of the United States had accepted the offer of Great Britain to pay the sum awarded in full satisfaction of all claims, national and individual, the position of the fund would have been the same as it is now. For illustration, suppose a guardian presents to a wrong-doer a claim for compensation for $1,000 each for three of his wards? The wrong-doer replies: "It may be that I have injured one of them to the extent of a thousand dollars; but I deny that I have injured the other two." "Very well," says the guardian, "we will submit this question to arbitration." They select arbitrators, and they determine that the alleged wrong-doer shall pay the sum of $1,000, not for the injury to either ward, but as a gross sum in full satisfaction of the claim of the guardian for all three of his wards. Now is anything determined by such an award and by the receipt of the money under it as to what shall be done with that money as between the three wards? Obviously it is a fund to be disposed of as among them according to their equities and according to their rights.

In his message to Congress in December, 1872, after the making of this award, the President employs this language:

> It will be the province of Congress to provide for the distribution among those who may be entitled to it of their respective shares of the money to be paid. It is deemed advisable that no time be lost in making an examination of the several cases in which indemnification may be due.

Not payment—not payment to the insurance companies of the sum awarded to them by the Geneva tribunal, but to ascertain the parties to whom indemnification is due out of this fund. If the insurance companies, as claimed by my honorable colleague [Mr. WILLIS] are absolutely entitled to this money, it is not an indemnity fund; it is a fund which the Government holds, as he claims, strictly as a trustee; and, although having the legal title, it is bound to pay it to them without reference to any other question or consideration.

Mr. Speaker, this fund has never been so treated by any department of the Government since the award was made. The subject of the disposition of this fund was very elaborately discussed by both Houses of the Forty-second Congress. No agreement was reached, but this fact does appear, that the Judiciary Committees of the House and the Senate were of opinion after careful consideration, and both reported bills based on the theory, that no legal right or fiduciary trust restrains Congress from the exercise of its own judgment in determining who were the actual ultimate unindemnified losers by the acts and faults complained of, and equitably distributing the fund among such cruisers and such only. The Forty-second Congress simply provided that this fund, which was in gold, should be covered into the Treasury and invested in the 5 per cent. obligations of the Government, and such investment was made. The question came up again in the Forty-third Congress and resulted in the passage of the act of June 23, 1874, which was the result of the deliberations of the Forty-second as well as the Forty-third Congress, the result of wide discussion and consideration, not only on the part of the committees of the two Houses, but of most elaborate debates on the floor in both branches.

By that act the claims for direct losses, national and individual, by the inculpated cruisers were provided for, and it was also provided that the insurance companies should be paid the losses they had actually sustained over and above war premiums, whether by the inculpated or the exculpated cruisers, and that the balance should remain in the Treasury a fund from which Congress might thereafter authorize the payment of claims thereon.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a crowning objection to the proposal of the report of the majority that this whole question be committed to the Court of Claims, with a right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, is that it would cause delay and might lead to an entire reversal of the action of Congress thus far and of the policy upon which this fund has thus far been distributed. If there be anything in regard to this fund which should be deemed settled for all time, it is that the legislation of the Forty-third Congress so far as it determines the principles upon which this distribution is to be made shall be accepted as final and conclusive upon the subject.

The insurance companies, as being entitled, in the judgment of Congress, to the highest equity after actual losers, have been paid all the losses which they sustained by means of the operation of all these confederate vessels, both the exculpated and the inculpated cruisers. They have made up a general account of all their losses, and have taken from that the war premiums they received, of which they kept a separate account, and the balance has been paid them. The direct losses of the Government, which were trifling, and the direct losses of individuals by the inculpated cruisers have also been paid. About half the fund was absorbed in making these payments, and in round numbers the sum of $10,000,000 in currency remains yet to be disposed of by the action of Congress.

Another objection to the proposal of the majority is not only that it provides for long delay and vexatious litigation in the courts, which will keep the poor claimants upon this fund out of the receipt of their money for a series of years, but it entails the extire expense of the litigation upon the Government of the United States.

The theory of the minority, as was the theory of the act of 1874, is that all the expense attendant upon the distribution of this fund should be paid out of the fund itself by a tribunal created for the express purpose of disposing of the questions of fact which arise in the case upon the principles established by the law of Congress, and that all the expense of it should be paid out of the fund itself instead of being borne by the General Government.

The question now arises what is to be done with this balance of $10,000,000 of currency. There was much elaborate discussion in the Forty-fourth Congress and also during the remainder of the Forty-third Congress on this same subject. Bills were passed in both Houses in the second session of the Forty-third Congress and in the Forty-fourth Congress in substance like the bill reported by the minority of the Judiciary Committee, which has been read to the House, or was published in the RECORD, and is part of the proceedings of yesterday.

There have been some heretofore in favor of returning the balance of this fund to Great Britain. I apprehend, Mr. Speaker, now that we have paid and Great Britain has very readily grasped $5,500,000 for having caught a few mackerel and for the privilege of catching a few more, the number who are in favor of returning this to Great Britain will grow less and less daily. [Laughter.]

Some are for covering it into the Treasury of the United States. I believe there is nothing in either of the propositions now pending before the House on this subject. That idea seems to have been abandoned. It remains, then, a fund to be given to the class of persons in this country who suffered by the acts of the confederate cruisers, if that class of persons can be found.

Now it is argued that the term "indirect claims," which were excluded by the opinion of the arbitrators at Geneva, embraces the claims of those who paid war premiums during the war. Mr. Speaker, I cannot concur in this opinion. It seems to me that the owner of an American vessel who refused to transfer it to the British flag, who paid war premiums upon it, who was deprived of competition by reason of the large transfer to the British flag, who suffered these war premiums as an actual loss, and never was reimbursed for them, is, above all other classes of persons, entitled to compensation out of this fund. The patriotism of such men cannot be doubted; their fidelity to the Government cannot be questioned, and their willingness to help preserve the mere remnant of American commerce entitles them, in my judgment, to the highest consideration in the disposition which is to be made of this money. The bill of the minority provides that they shall only be paid their actual losses. They kept an account, and if they realized any return for the war premiums they were compelled to pay they will have to account for that as the insurance companies accounted for their war premiums, and only the balance can be received by them.

Another class of persons who it seems to me are clearly entitled to compensation out of this fund are those who suffered injuries by what are termed the "exculpated cruisers." The act of 1874 virtually determines that because insurance companies have been paid upon the basis of that claim and by that mode of allowance. The owner of the Delphine is as much entitled, I repeat, to compensation from this money as is the owner of the last whaler which was burned in the Arctic Ocean by the Shenandoah. It was an act of the same vessel, fitted out for the same piratical purpose, pursuing a continued course of wrong, which has resulted in these grave losses.

Mr. Speaker, there are many other details growing out of the recommendations of the minority report and the bill which is recommended by the minority as a substitute to which I might advert, but I shall leave that for my associates on the committee who are more familiar with those details and content myself with the discussion of these general considerations growing out of the condition of the fund and the leading comments upon it. And in conclusion, sir, I repeat, this sum of money, although received by the Government in its absolute right as a sovereign in the exercise of the treaty-making power, although the legal title to it is in the United States, nevertheless it is a fund which came into the Treasury of the Government designed as an indemnity to all who lost by the action of the British government or the confederate cruisers during the whole period of our civil war.

Sir, I repeat what I said on a former occasion. Good faith is a jewel. It is so as between man and man. It is much more so as between the government and the people the government represents; and the highest duty, the most implicit good faith demands of the Government that in disposing of this money every man who suffered by the acts of the confederate cruisers shall be compensated for his loss if there be money enough left to accomplish that purpose.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 1437) relating to public printing and binding.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 5307) to correct an error of enrollment in the bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 5231) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

GENEVA AWARD.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4553) to provide for the further distribution of the moneys received under the Geneva award.

Mr. BICKNELL. Mr. Speaker, in our war with the confederates, Great Britain having violated her neutral obligations, our citizens injured thereby had a right to redress from the British government. By the law of nations they might have sought that redress by petition to that government. By the Constitution of the United States our citizens in such a case are forbidden to proceed directly against a foreign government, but their right to redress remains, to be enforced only by the intervention of the United States. Our injured citizens demanded such intervention and obtained it.

Our Government made a public declaration through its Department of State, in 1871, that it "would present to the tribunal at Geneva, to be taken into account in estimating the sum to be paid to the United States, all the Alabama claims." It gave notice to the claimants to send in their claims for that purpose without delay. The people obeyed the notice and sent in their claims accordingly.

The tribunal at Geneva was a board of arbitrators with power to make a binding award; the Government declared to the people "Send in your claims and we will present them, and collect them if we can." On the faith of that the people sent in their claims to be presented. Whether these facts and the subsequent collection of the money created a technical trust or not, they certainly created some obligation on the part of our Government; there was a duty incumbent on the Government after receiving the claims, and a further duty after receiving the money. In the Rustomjee case the money was paid by the Emperor of China to Queen Victoria under a treaty. Chief-Justice Coleridge, in delivering the opinion of the highest court of England, said: "On the payment of the money by the Emperor of China there was a duty on the part of the English sovereign to administer the money so received according to the stipulations of the treaty." So here it may be said, upon the payment of the money awarded it became the duty of the United States to administer the money according to the award. The Government presented these private claims to the arbitrators, and at the same time presented its own claims.

The private claims were for direct losses by destruction of vessels and cargoes, and also for losses by payment of enhanced premiums for insurance. The claims of the Government were for expenses in the pursuit of the confederate cruisers, and for losses by the transfer of American commerce to the British flag, and for the prolonged duration of the war by reason of the action of the cruisers. The arbitrators decided unanimously that, "on the principles of international law, applicable to such cases, there was no foundation for any award of compensation" for the enhanced war premiums, nor for the loss of commerce, nor for the prolonged duration of the war. The United States thereupon declared that those three claims would not be insisted on and might be excluded from all further consideration in the award, and the arbitrators entered a declaration to that effect in their record. After this neither arbitrators nor parties had anything more to do with enhanced war premiums, or loss of commerce, or prolonged duration of the war; those three topics were as completely out of the case as if they had never been in it.

The arbitrators next decided that there was no ground for awarding to the United States any sum by way of indemnity for costs of pursuit of the confederate cruisers.

This decision left but one class of claims pending before the arbitrators, namely, claims for direct losses by destruction of ships and cargoes; everything else had been settled by the previous decisions. The arbitrators next decided that Great Britain had violated her neutral obligations as to the Alabama, the Florida, and the Shenandoah after she left Melbourne, and had not violated her neutral obligations as to any of the other cruisers. This decision settled the question that the only damages to be awarded were damages for the destruction of ships and cargoes by those three cruisers, and in order to make the award nothing further was required than to ascertain what vessels and cargoes had been destroyed by the three guilty cruisers, and the values of such vessels and cargoes. Upon these points elaborate statements and estimates and proofs were made before the arbitrators by both parties. The arbitrators were authorized to award a sum in gross large enough to cover all the claims allowed, or to send the cases to a board of assessors. At the earnest request of the United States, and to avoid the trouble, expense, and delay of assessors, the arbitrators themselves ascertained the amounts and agreed upon fifteen and a half millions of dollars as a sum large enough to cover all the claims proved and allowed, and interest at 6 per cent.

The only claims allowed were for ships and cargoes destroyed by the Alabama, the Florida, and the Shenandoah after she left Melbourne. For these only did Great Britain pay the money. These only were settled by the payment. The other claims were also settled and put at rest by the award, the arbitrators having decided that for them nothing could be allowed. The United States having received the money, questions arose about the distribution of it. A part of it has been distributed under an act of Congress which has expired. There are about $10,000,000 yet to be distributed. The bill reported by the Judiciary Committee provides that "all claimants of the money may sue in the Court of Claims as in other cases," and that said court shall render judgment "according to the principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations." These are the principles that govern such cases, and these principles undoubtedly can be better ascertained and applied in such a court than in Congress.

Upon these considerations I urge the passage of the bill of the committee. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine is objectionable because it seeks to deprive one class of claimants, the insurers, of rights which were expressly recognized by the arbitrators and adopted by them as the basis of their award, such rights as have never heretofore been denied in any general court of law or equity anywhere. No right, legal or equitable, is more fully sustained by all the authorities than the right of an insurer who has paid for a lost vessel to take the place of the owner and succeed to all his advantages. The notion that such a right can be taken away or impaired by reference to the insurer's profits in other cases is absolutely without support in law or equity or general usage.

The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is objectionable because it recognizes as valid claims which were utterly rejected by the arbitrators, for which they decided that nothing could be allowed and for which nothing was awarded, namely, claims for enhanced premiums of insurance.

The United States has the power to confiscate all this money, to withhold it from those for whom only it was paid, and apply it on any or all of the rejected claims, private or public; but we are bound in justice, in equity, in honor, and in good morals to pay the money upon the claims for which the United States received it, and for which Great Britain paid it. That duty will be fulfilled if the bill of the Judiciary Committee shall become a law. It will be violated if either of the proposed amendments shall become a law.

There may be some special pleading in support of these amendments, but no sophistry can disguise the question. It is simply this: Shall we pay the money on the claims recognized and allowed by the arbitrators, or upon claims rejected and disallowed? To this question the valid answer is the obvious one; we are bound to apply the money to the claims on which it was paid and received.

Mr. POTTER. I speak to this subject at the request of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. I agree with my colleague [Mr. LAPHAM] that the subject is one of the highest public importance. It embraces difficult and complicated questions; questions upon which it is, I think, as easy to go wrong on first impressions as upon almost any public question I have met. I remember very well that I went wrong myself when my attention was first called to this subject. I remember, too, that in the first discussion I heard in this House about these Alabama claims my friend the late Mr. Kerr, than whom there was no purer nor wiser nor braver public man, declared that such had been his experience also.

Our Government holds a fund received from Great Britain upon claims that it presented against that nation under the circumstances just stated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BICKNELL] who has so succinctly and ably and judicially summarized this case; claims presented by the Government of the United States for losses to itself as sovereign and claims presented by it for losses suffered by individual citizens, presented on their behalf and at their request.

Now, a citizen who has lost his property by the negligence of a neutral nation has a right to compensation, but no remedy. He can petition the neutral nation for redress, or he can ask his own government to apply for redress. In this matter our citizens did not petition Great Britain for redress. Some of them were about to do so when the President expressed the desire that all claims because of the negligence of Great Britain during the war should be presented by our Government itself.

What, then, is the liability of our Government for the sum of money received upon an award for claims such as these? Does it hold the fund so received at its discretion, to give it away to whom it chooses, governed only by its own sense of what is best? Or does it hold it under any obligation, moral or otherwise, to give it to the persons upon whose claims it was collected; or to account in any way to the persons in respect of whose losses it was paid?

That minority of the Committee on the Judiciary, in the views they have presented in their dissent from the report of that committee, have met this question fairly and frankly. They say that in respect of this fund the Government of the United States is under no liability whatever. They have cited to us the case of the English government, which collected from China a sum of money for debts due from China to specific citizens of Great Britain, the principal claim being that of an Indian merchant which the agents of the British government, at the time they were pressing China for these claims, promised should be collected for him; and they tell us that the English courts held that Great Britain was not liable to be proceeded against at law by any of those claimants whose debts had thus been recovered by the government from China, and notably not by the identical Indian merchant whom the British agents had most in mind when they pressed these claims.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there was such a case and such a judgment, but it seems to me, that the gentlemen in citing this case have failed to present the real ground of that decision. I agree that the English sovereign was not liable to be proceeded against by petition of right in respect to this money so collected of China; that she collected and held it as sovereign under no legal liability whatever; just so we hold the Alabama fund under no legal liability whatever. The sovereign of Great Britain in respect of her subjects is under the general liability of a sovereign to all her people, but beyond that she is sometimes under special liabilities to some of her subjects because of money which she personally owes them, or because of some personal obligation she may have come under to them, or because she has consented as to some one of her subjects to stand as a trustee of his property or estates. If the subject would proceed against her for some such specific claim in respect of which she stands under some personal liability to him, he may proceed by petition of right; but if a subject seeks relief in respect of some duty or right which she owes him not personally but as a sovereign and arising out of her action as sovereign, then her courts have no jurisdiction to hear such claim. She must determine it herself with the advice of her council.

In that respect Great Britain is like our own Government. We have a Court of Claims in which the legal claims of our citizens against the Government arising upon contract may be prosecuted. The Government has also duties to its citizens as a nation which can be enforced only by the Congress and in its discretion. I agree that this Alabama money is one of those things in respect of which the Government is not subject to any legal prosecution, and in respect of which it holds the money to be distributed only in the discretion and judgment of Congress, just as the sovereign held the money recovered from China for the debts of that nation to her subjects. But what is that discretion and duty? It is, I agree, the same discretion and duty, and no higher, as that under which the Queen of Great Britain held the money paid under the Chinese treaty; a discretion to be exercised according to moral rights; to be exercised according to justice; to be exercised acording to the natural rights of the claimants in respect of the fund she so collected; a discretion to be exercised with the advice of her council instead of the judgment of her law courts. That is all, sir, the decision in this English case amounts to. Every one of the judges in that case, while declaring that the queen was not liable to be proceeded against by petition of right for money thus collected of China in her sovereign capacity, said also that she held it under her prerogative as a sovereign to be distributed by the advice of her council according to the moral rights to the fund of the respective claimants. Just so we of the Congress hold this fund to be distributed by the advice of each other and such other best advice as we may obtain, but to be distributed not according to caprice, but according to the moral right of the claimant for it, if there be any one having any moral right to any part of it.

Now, whether there be any moral right in respect of the distribution of this money, whether any one citizen can say, not that he has any legal right to it, but that he has a moral claim to any part of this money over any other citizen, depends upon what it was paid for.

We all know the history of this fund. The United States claimed that by reason of the negligence of Great Britain we had suffered various losses, namely: First, the prolongation and increased cost of the war; second, the transfer of our commerce by the effects of the war to the English flag; third, the enhanced premiums paid by our citizens for insurance. These were called the claims for indirect losses. And we know the fate they met. They were declared by the judgment of the tribunal, and the unanimous judgment of it I believe, not to afford, neither of them, any just ground of claim on the part of our Government against Great Britain whatever. And not only was that the determination of the tribunal, but it was the determination accepted both by the United States and by Great Britain. In the communication formally made to the tribunal upon the part of our Government it was declared that—

> The declaration made by the tribunal that these indirect claims must be disallowed and rejected is accepted by the President of the United States as determinative of their judgment upon the important questions of public law involved. The agent of the United States is authorized to say that consequently the above-mentioned claims will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, and may be excluded from all consideration in any award that may be made.

That disposed, sir, and finally, of the indirect claims. We come, then, to the other claims presented by our Government, called the claims for direct losses. Now, what were the direct claims? Why, the claims because of the losses and damage sustained by citizens of the United States for their ships and goods which had been destroyed upon the high seas by these confederate cruisers, including as well of course the ships of the Government itself so destroyed as the ships of its citizens; and, beyond that, claims for damage to the owners of ships and goods because of the loss of prospective profits upon their ventures; all claims, however, arising from the destruction of enumerated vessels. Well, now, what was adjudicated in regard to these direct claims? First, that our Government was not entitled to recover for any loss that took place by the Sumter and several other vessels, whose names I have forgotten, that belonged in the same category with the Sumter; next, that she could not recover for the expenses she had incurred in pursuit of the confederate cruisers; next, she could not recover for the losses occasioned by the Shenandoah before she left Melbourne; and that in all these respects Great Britain was not in fault. And, finally, that Great Britain was liable for the losses occasioned by the Alabama, by the Florida, and by the Shenandoah after she left Melbourne.

So, sir, when you get down to that point in the decisions of the Geneva tribunal and to the further declaration of the tribunal that in estimating the losses occasioned by the Alabama, Florida, and Shenandoah after Melbourne they would not reckon anticipated profits and would allow for net freights instead of for gross freights, you get to a point at which every possible claim presented to the tribunal had been disallowed and was eliminated, except only the claims for the one hundred and seventeen vessels and their cargoes beginning with the Adelaide and ending with the Zebra, presented by our citizens, (I do not now recall the number of vessels so claimed for and their names, but I use these for illustration,) and based upon our estimate of the valuation of such ships and cargoes and claimed by our Government in consequence of such presentation.

Now, can any gentleman say that upon that state of facts this Government stands under no obligation of duty and conscience to give this money to the owners of those ships and the goods which were laden on them? Does it not shock any man's sense of right to hold that if our Government should go to collect moneys due to its citizens from, if you please, Venezuela, and should succeed in getting in some $200,000 that that state owes upon its bonds to our people, scattered all over the United States, that it might then say to them, "We have collected this money in our sovereign capacity; we have it in our Treasury and shall pay it to whom we please. Instead of giving it to you we will give it to the poor Indians in the far West, who are much more in need of it than you bondholders, because you are generally rich and have, as a whole, done well with your investments, however it may be with these Venezuela bonds." Could Government decently do this? Has she any right to do anything else with the money so collected than to give it to the people for whom it was paid? Surely, upon every principle of reason and justice, no. Just so in this case it is to the persons interested in the ships and the cargoes specified before the tribunal and there allowed for, and the only claims there allowed for, that she ought to give the money paid to her because of such allowance for the destruction of their property.

But it is said there was not any specified allowance for ships and cargoes so provided. That is true. It is said there was instead a round and gross sum awarded; and that is true. And yet it is none the less true that such gross sum was allowed for ships and cargoes, and for nothing else.

Why do I say this? Because it was for ships and cargoes destroyed by the inculpated cruisers and for those alone that the sum of $15,500,000 awarded was made up. We presented a list of say one hundred and seventeen ships, if that was the number—I repeat I use that number by way of illustration only—and we presented at the same time proofs of their value. Of course our people made proofs of value in war times when currency was low and the value of ships and goods might naturally and conscientiously then be stated at high rates. Great Britain also made an estimate of the value of those one hundred and seventeen ships and their cargoes which was much lower than our valuation; and when the tribunal had determined it would allow for ships and cargoes and nothing else, instead of taking proof as to their value it fixed that value and the amount of the allowance by taking the American valuation of the enumerated ships and the cargoes on them, and the English valuation of the enumerated ships and the cargoes on them and dividing the aggregate in two, and assuming the mean of the two alleged valuations as the true valuation, which amounted, with some little special allowance to fishing vessels and some minor deductions, to the sum of $10,121,044. Then subsequently they added interest to the sum of money so allowed, and that interest was determined at 6 per cent., as we learn from Sir Alexander Cockburn's opinion, and the tribunal thus reached as the amount to be allowed for these vessels and cargoes the sum of $15,409,289.69. Now, having got there, they awarded $15,500,000. Having got for specific vessels and specific cargoes and interest a valuation of $15,409,000, they allowed a round sum of $15,500,000.

Now, it has over and over again been claimed that that difference between the tribunal's valuation of the ships and cargoes allowed for and the amount of the award left our Government at liberty to say that the money paid was the result of national claims, or at least not paid for individual property.

Now, I venture to think that when every claim had been eliminated except the claims for ships and cargoes, and when these claims had been paid to the Government, the fact that a receipt in full was given by the Government made no difference in its liability to the owners of these vessels. Suppose I come to you with claims in behalf of A, B, C, and D; you satisfy me that A's claim is bad, that B's claim is bad, that C's claim is bad, and I give them up; then you pay me the claim of D, and take a receipt in full instead of a receipt specifying D's claim particularly as paid. Does that alter the situation at all? Can it change my liability to D in any way? Besides, there was a reason for the tribunal fixing a round sum and requiring a receipt in full. There was reason for declaring that the sum of $15,500,000 was paid for something besides these enumerated vessels and cargoes valued at $15,409,000. What was that something? Why, that there were or might be other vessels and other cargoes of the same class destroyed by the inculpated cruisers for which claims had not then been presented, but for which, upon the principles determined by the tribunal, Great Britain would have been liable. What was meant by the award of that round sum was to close the door against any further presentation of claims of that sort—I mean the sort of claims allowed for. This explains satisfactorily the trifling difference between the sum actually due according to the estimate of the tribunal for ships and cargoes destroyed by the inculpated cruisers and the sum actually awarded.

Now, when gentlemen say that this money thus paid for these one hundred and seventeen ships and their cargoes should go to pay enhanced war premiums for which the tribunal declared Great Britain was not liable—a decision which we accepted—it seems to me they might as well ask to have this money applied to any other charitable purpose. The real losers in this war, in one sense, were the persons who paid the enhanced premium; but we are dealing with a sum of money paid by the government of Great Britain for losses resulting from its negligence—not for charity; not for anything else but damages for that negligence; and the losses so resulting from the negligence of Great Britain and allowed for were the losses of ships and cargoes which were destroyed. Not only was there no allowance for enhanced premiums of insurance, but this is one of the things for which it was expressly declared Great Britain was not liable; and that decision we accepted. So in regard to the exculpated cruisers. Some gentleman may say, "The Shenandoah sailed into Melbourne on a Sunday morning and sailed out on Sunday night, and it is very hard that a man who lost his ship by the Shenandoah on the Saturday preceding should not be compensated for that loss, while the man who lost his vessel by the Shenandoah on the following Monday is paid in full." It may be hard, but the difficulty is with the nature of the case. It was for letting the Shenandoah escape from Melbourne that Great Britain was held liable; and in respect to the destruction on the Saturday before she left there, it was one of those misfortunes for which Great Britain at least was not liable, and for the payment of which the money paid for the negligence she did commit in respect of enumerated ships can no more be diverted rightfully than could any other money.

It is said, often and truthfully, that the amount of this award exceeds the just claim of the persons who upon the statement I have been making have alone any right to this money. That is so. Our ships were overvalued. They were overvalued, I assume, because the depreciation of our currency was then such that valuations made in it would from subsequent appreciation of the currency to par with gold give us too large a fund and would leave in our hands a fund more than sufficient to pay the losses for which it was allowed. When we have paid the losses for which it was allowed, we can then say what shall be done with the surplus; but I submit that until we discharge this duty we have no business to be giving the surplus away. In my judgment, when that time comes the surplus ought to be covered into the Treasury; but I believe also as regards the amount necessary to discharge the claims of the persons interested in the ships and cargoes for which Great Britain paid this money it ought either to be paid to the men for whose property it was allowed or else it ought to be returned to Great Britain.

Now, it is said that our Government constantly declared that it was not to be committed as to the mode of distributing this award. I agree that it declared it was not to be committed as to this; and it was not committed. It might have been committed but for this declaration; but it was not committed. Why do I say it might have been committed? Because it so happens as matter of fact that this whole business of getting up claims against Great Britain by private parties was started and kept in motion mainly by the insurance companies. They are the people who began it; it was they who pressed the Government; it was their claims that were sent forward; it was their counsel, Mr. Evarts, who became counsel before the tribunal for the Government; and it was precisely because the Government did not intend that the question which we are now speaking to, or rather which I shall presently speak to, should be prejudged that the Government declared it would not have the mode of distribution settled in the treaty. But that did not alter rights; that did not change the ownership of the property for which the money was paid; that did not alter a man's status in regard to the money recovered for his property. The mode of distribution has not been preadjudicated. We are here to-day to say what the mode ought to be.

And let me say here, I look with some satisfaction upon the progress of the House in that regard. I remember in the Forty-second Congress, when I suggested that it should be referred to some court to distribute this fund on the principles of natural equity and justice, I stood absolutely alone. No other member of the Judiciary Committee agreed with me about it. When I got into the Forty-third Congress I had agreeing with me there in my views of this question the gentleman from Vermont, that able and experienced jurist, Mr. Poland, the gentleman from Ohio, now president of the Erie Railway, Mr. Jewett, and my colleague from the Albany district, that eloquent lawyer, Mr. Tremaine, now lately deceased, in all, four members of the Judiciary Committee. At last, in this Congress, and I may be pardoned if I feel some satisfaction in the fact that it is a democratic Congress, the Judiciary Committee, by a majority of all its members, has reported a bill to refer the determination of this question to a court of justice.

But we are told not to send this fund to any court of justice to be distributed, as in that event some insurer may get a portion of it who, on the whole, was not a loser by the war. That is not impossible. The struggle in regard to this fund has mainly been between the insurers on the one hand, and the men who have claims for the payment of enhanced war risks on the other. These claims for enhanced premiums have, I hear, largely gone into the hands of men who devote attention to them, for a share of what may be recovered on them; and they form a large and pressing interest, but none the less are entitled to consideration and justice. And the other claims remain in the hands of insurers where they always have been, and they form another strong interest. Now, an insurance company is not entitled to any favor. No corporation, in my judgment, is entitled to any favors, but just so long as our laws permit the creation of these artificial persons, just so long are they entitled to justice—nothing else, not to favor, but to justice, and to that they are as much entitled as is any other citizen.

Now what are the relations of a marine insurer to property destroyed upon the high seas. They differ from the relations of an ordinary inland insurance against fire. The usual contract of marine insurance is that in case of loss the insurer will, if called on to do so, pay a fixed sum and take the property insured. I have a ship valued at and insured for $100,000 which is sunk by collision with another vessel and I abandon my ship over to the insurance company and take my $100,000, and the right to my ship sunk in the bottom of the ocean and the right to collect her loss of the ship that sunk her both go to the insurance company. If they can recover the ship or damages for her loss they are to keep them, and if it should only cost two or three thousand dollars to raise the ship, so much the better for the insurer under the contract. Just so, their right to this fund, so far as they have any right at all, arises solely from the fact that by their contracts with the owners of the ships they bought some of the ships destroyed by the inculpated cruiser, and by their contracts with the owners of cargoes bought some of the cargoes laden on such ships. And just so far as they have not done that they cannot have any right in respect of this fund at all.

It is said the owners of ships and of cargoes ought in some cases not to be paid out of this fund because they made a profit out of the business connected with insuring ships in war times and therefore they were not losers by the war. The fallacy lies in the sense of the word "loser." I am a merchant in New York, if you please, engaged in trade, in silk or tea; my warehouses are full of goods when a war breaks out, a ship of mine on the high seas is captured by one of the cruisers escaping by the negligence of Great Britain, yet the effect of the war in putting up the prices of my stock is such that I have absolutely gained in respect of my whole property, so that I am better off notwithstanding the loss of this ship because of the war than before; but am I not a loser of my ship for all that, and is Great Britain any less liable to me on that account? So here. What sort of reply would it have been for Great Britain to answer us at the tribunal of Geneva, Why, gentlemen, your ship-owners were paid for their ships by the insurers and the business the insurers were enabled to carry on because of our negligence was such that they actually made by the war instead of losing, and therefore you ought to recover nothing? That is exactly what the counsel for Great Britain did urge, and what the tribunal repudiated. It is exactly what every man under the circumstances must see should be repudiated, because the question is, who lost by the negligence of Great Britain and what was his loss, not whether he gained or lost by the war.

Suppose my horse has been stolen and some one should bet me one hundred dollars to five dollars that my horse will not be recovered within the next fortnight. I make the bet with him and my horse is not recovered and the hundred dollars, the full value of the stolen animal, is paid to me. Suppose, too, that two years afterward the horse should turn up in a remote part of the country and I say to the person having him, give me back my horse which has been stolen from me. Suppose then he should answer no, you have been paid through your wager all that your horse was worth and I am no longer bound to return him. Would we not all say that such an answer was intolerable nonsense?

And just so it is in regard to these insurance companies. I do not believe that at the time anybody supposed that Great Britain would ever pay a dime for their losses. I believe the first who conceived the idea of getting money from Great Britain for these losses was these very insurance companies, and it was their luck that the money was recovered just as it would have been my luck in the case supposed had I found my stolen horse. The profit in either case belongs to the owners of the property, not by favor, but by right.

I happen to have in my district one man who was interested in this fund. He was a large trader to the East Indies, and he took it into his head early in the war that the premium for war risks was too high, and he decided he would be his own insurer. Accordingly he opened an account with himself as an insurer. On one side of the account he charged himself with the premiums which he would have paid to the companies for insurance, and on the other side he credited that account with the losses of any of his ships. He lost, I think, one ship, and he told me that the upshot of his account was that it showed a profit. The insurance that he charged against himself amounted as a whole to more than the value of the ship that was lost. But when we passed the first Alabama claims bill he marched straight down here and collected the money for that same ship that was lost, notwithstanding the profit of his account as insurer.

But if instead of insuring himself he had been insured by a neighbor, neither he nor that neighbor could, according to the minority of this committee, have recovered anything for the lost ship. Is that right?

Now, the question whether a claimant was insured or uninsured does not concern us. Does the money which we have belong to the owners of the ships that were lost, is the question? If so, then it should go to the parties interested, whether they carried on their business of sailing ships and carrying goods or insuring them wisely or unwisely, whether they were fortunate at it or unfortunate. That is a matter beyond the reach of Congress to adjust, or ought to be.

I say it ought to be beyond the reach of Congress to adjust, for Congress should legislate by right and not by favor. In this minority report there is a declaration that if this fund is left for Congress to distribute, it never will be distributed to these insurers, whereas if the question goes to a court it may be so distributed to them.

Now I venture to say that is no reason for not sending the fund to the courts to be distributed. The very first duty of a government is to do justice. You do not want a government to do favors. Men can get favors without the help of government. We can get along without any sort of government if we are to go only on the principle of favor. We represent the eyes of the figure of Justice as bound so that she may not distinguish those she loves from those she hates. To my mind one of the worst governments to be conceived of would be a popular government without limitation that left three hundred or four hundred gentlemen assembled together here the power to dispose of the money in the Treasury without regard to right and with reference only to favor. I appeal to every man within the sound of my voice to say whether month by month and year by year he does not become more and more convinced that there is not on the face of the earth so respectable a body as this less fitted to administer justice according to right and to law.

I therefore favor the transmission of this fund to some independent tribunal to distribute this fund in cold blood according to right, and according to nothing else but right.

If that should result in those being paid out of the fund whom I think should be paid it will be well. But if not, and if the courts should give this fund to those who have, I think, no right to it, none the less we have done our duty and done the best we can when we refer the matter to a proper tribunal to be disposed of upon principles of natural equity and justice.

And here let me add one word about the danger which must follow from holding that this money was paid for anything but ships and cargoes destroyed and that it may be distributed to any but the owners of such ships and cargoes. To do that will be to leave it open to be said that after all the indirect claims were not disallowed, and leave Great Britain and all other nations hereafter to insist when we are negligent as neutrals that we must pay such indirect as well as direct losses. No, let us stand by the award and refuse to pay what the tribunal declared was not to be allowed, and pay the fund to those only to whom a court of justice may find it in morals and equity belongs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. With the consent of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] in charge of this bill, it will be allowed to go over until to-morrow after the reading of the Journal, and the Chair will recognize one or two gentlemen who have matters to present.

Mr. KNOTT. I have no objection to that.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. BANNING, from the joint committee of the two Houses upon the subject of the reform and reorganization of the Army, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (H. R. No. 5499) to reduce and reorganize the Army of the United States, and to make rules for its government and regulation.

The bill was read a first and second time, with the accompanying report ordered to be printed, and made a special order in the House, as in Committee of the Whole, for Thursday, the 9th of January next, after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

EXCUSE FOR ABSENCE.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. HOUSE, is detained from the House to-day by reason of sickness in his family.

CHARLES P. BIRKETT, INDIAN AGENT.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, by the unanimous instruction of the Committee on Appropriations, I report a bill which I desire to be put on its passage at the present time; but before that is done I would like to be indulged, if it be in order, in a word of explanation.

The SPEAKER. The bill will first be read.

Mr. FINLEY. I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The right to object will be reserved.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 5500) to repeal so much of the sundry civil appropriation act for the year ending June 30, 1879, as appropriates to Charles P. Birkett, the sum of $32,505.71, late Indian agent at Ponca agency, Dakota.

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, approved June 20, 1878," as is in the words following, that is to say, "to pay to Charles P. Birkett the sum of $32,505.71, to reimburse the said Birkett, late United States Indian agent, for amount expended by him for the benefit of the Indians at Ponca agency, Dakota," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana desires to make a statement, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to occupy the time of the House but a single moment. At the last session of Congress a subcommittee of which I was a member had occasion to investigate this claim; and upon our recommendation it was not placed in the sundry civil appropriation bill by this branch of Congress.

Mr. EDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. EDEN. I would like to know why the committee allow claims of this character to get into the sundry civil appropriation bill, as they do not properly belong there?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. If the gentleman will give attention he shall understand.

Mr. EDEN. That is what I want to know.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I had said that a subcommittee of which

I was a member had investigated at the last session of Congress this claim, and on a report that it was believed to be fraudulent in character it was not placed by this branch of Congress in the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. EDEN. I think, Mr. Speaker, that if the gentleman had at the time made that fact known we should have defeated the sundry civil bill rather than pass it with that fraudulent claim in it.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to say that personally I had no knowledge of the fact that this item of appropriation remained in the bill after the conference had been had; or I myself, if I had been present, should have objected.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman permit me——

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I decline to yield at present.

Mr. FINLEY. I reserved the right to object; I insisted that that right should be reserved. Now I simply desire to ask the gentleman one question; and if it is answered favorably I shall not object; otherwise I shall. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio reserved the right to object; but the objection must be absolute, not conditional.

Mr. FINLEY. I understand the gentleman to yield to me for a question.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Certainly; I have no objection.

Mr. FINLEY. I desire to ask the gentleman how this appropriation came to be inserted in the sundry civil bill if it is fraudulent?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. If gentlemen will try to restrain their impatience until I shall have proceeded a little further, I trust they will be able to understand how this thing occurred, so far as I am permitted to make the statement in accordance with parliamentary usage. I do not desire to transgress the rule in that respect.

I was about to say, when interrupted by three or four gentlemen on the other side, that this subject had been investigated and rejected by the committee. I may say that this item of appropriation was first sought to be placed on the deficiency bill when under consideration by the Committee on Appropriations of this House. It was, however, rejected, and did not go into that bill. It was then sought to be placed on the sundry civil appropriation bill, but by the unanimous voice of the Committee on Appropriations of this House it found no place in that bill. It was placed in the sundry civil appropriation bill elsewhere after the same had passed this House.

Mr. FINLEY. Where? That is what I want to know.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I am not permitted to say where, but everybody knows.

Mr. EDEN. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will be permitted to complete his statement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman should not be interrupted except by his own consent.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to say that I will not yield to further interruption until I have completed my statement. Then if any pertinent and legitimate question is asked and I am permitted to retain the floor, I shall be very happy to answer it.

I say that this amendment was placed in the sundry civil appropriation bill elsewhere. The circumstances under which it was placed there and the influences that were brought to bear to place it there, I know nothing about except by common rumor. It is sufficient for me to say, however, that it is to-day embodied in the law of the land; and that without any fault of the Committee on Appropriations of this House and without any fault on the part of the House members of the committee of conference had on the bill, as I believe.

Having been informed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs at an early day after the commencement of the present session of Congress that the Department had further evidence than was possessed last summer that this item in the bill was fraudulent from top to bottom, the Committee on Appropriations adopted a resolution requesting that all the evidence and all the facts bearing on the subject, in possession of the Indian Office or the Treasury Department, should be laid before the committee. That has been done and a voluminous mass of evidence is presented. A subcommittee consisting of two members of the Committee on Appropriations have given that evidence a patient and thorough examination, and they have reached the conclusion that this claim is wholly fraudulent. In this conclusion they are sustained by the unanimous judgment of the Committee on Appropriations of the House. It seems to me that it is sufficient for the present, without undertaking to determine now or here who is responsible for the near consummation of this fraud which is sought to be perpetrated upon the Treasury, for us to pass this bill at once and prevent further mischief. When advised by the unanimous judgment of one of the committees of the House that a fraud is liable to be consummated unless we act, we should, it seems to me, instead of undertaking to hunt around to find out who may be at fault for this item getting into the sundry civil appropriation bill, pass this bill promptly that it may go to the other end of the Capitol to receive early action there.

I am not here, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of retailing reports that have come to me. I have no accusations to make. It is sufficient to say that I have gone through the mass of evidence presented from the beginning to the end, and that in my judgment a more unmitigated swindle was never attempted to be foisted on an appropriation bill, or a more unblushing robbery ever attempted to be perpetrated by plundering the people's treasury. I do not desire, Mr. Speaker, to go into the details, giving the items of evidence and the statements of fact. These are all before our committee. I simply desire now to ask the House to pass this bill and to pass it at once.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection, and the bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If my colleague on the committee will yield to me a moment I will add a word of explanation.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. With pleasure.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. When this claim came before the Committee on Appropriations it was unanimously rejected upon the ground that it was a claim and not an audited account and had never been favorably reported by the Committee of Claims. It reappeared when the sundry civil bill came from the Senate in the shape of a Senate amendment. That amendment was non-concurred in by the House. It went to the committee of conference, and in the committee of conference, I think I violate no parliamentary usage by saying, the House committee were unanimously opposed to its passage.

You remember that the sundry civil bill was in conference committee for nearly three days, almost day and night. It was necessary to arrive at some adjustment of the terms. At that time the conference committee on the part of the House had no knowledge the claim was fraudulent. They only knew it had not been properly adjudicated. On the other hand, they were assured the claim was a just claim, and the Senate committee assumed the responsibility of that fact. I do not think I can go further than that. And in the final arrangement of items this was allowed as one placed in by the Senate and the responsibility for which was assumed by the Senate conference committee.

Mr. ATKINS. Exclusively.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Exclusively.

Of course every gentleman knows that in the adjustment of a bill involving more than $20,000,000 it is absolutely necessary that the committee of each House shall have some power and some discretion, and the item was included without the slightest knowledge on the part of the conferees of the House that there was anything fraudulent in it, and it is not to be imagined that the Senate committee believed it to be other than just. Nevertheless it now appears to have been fraudulent, and I have no doubt the Senate will be just as prompt and just as anxious to undo the mischief as this House ought to be, and I trust will be.

Mr. EDEN. Let me ask the gentleman a single question.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York whether it is not a violation of the rules of the House to admit a private claim in a general appropriation bill?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am not so well advised as to the rules of the House as the gentleman who asks the question. If, however, it be against the rules of the House, they were not violated in this case, because the Appropriation Committee did not allow the claim.

Mr. ATKINS. If that is the rule I will answer the gentleman that it is violated very often by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware there is such a rule.

Mr. ATKINS. It is a good one, though, if it did exist.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was again read.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman from Indiana has yielded to me for a moment. I simply desire to say, in order to put myself right on the record, that the reason of my reserving the right to object until the gentleman from Indiana had answered the questions addressed to him, was not because I was opposed to his bill; on the contrary I am very much in favor of it. But I understood from the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana that he implied that this had got on this bill by the action of the conference committee, and I desired to bring that matter out that we might have an understanding in regard to it. It has been fully explained to my satisfaction by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CONGER. I did not understand from the gentleman from Indiana whether this was reported from a committee.

The SPEAKER. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I report from the Committee on Appropriations a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 5484) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1880, and move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the pension appropriation bill and the substitute therefor.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair, and proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 5484) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1880, and the substitute therefor reported from the Committee on Appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute (H. R. No. 5501) will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes:

For pensions for Army invalids, for widows, minors, and dependent relatives, for survivors of the war of 1812, widows of the war of 1812, and for fees of examining surgeons, $28,600,000, as provided by the several acts of Congress: Provided, That a fee of $1, and no more, shall be paid to the examining surgeon for each examination of a pensioner, as provided by law, except when the examination is made by a board of surgeons, in which case the fees now allowed by law shall be paid: And provided further, That the amounts expended for each of the above items shall be accounted for separately.

For pay and allowances for salary, fees for preparing vouchers, rent, fuel, light, and postage on official matter directed to the Departments and bureaus at Washington, $225,000.

For Navy pensions to invalids, widows and dependent relatives, and for fees of examining surgeons, $538,500, as provided by the several acts of Congress: Provided, That the appropriations aforesaid for Navy pensions and other expenditures under that head shall be paid from the income of the Navy pension fund, so far as the same may be sufficient for that purpose: And provided further, That the amount expended for each of the above items shall be accounted for separately.

For pay and allowances for salary, fees for preparing vouchers, rent, fuel, light, and postage on official matter directed to the Departments and bureaus at Washington, $2,500.

SEC. 2. That any unexpended balances in the items of appropriation contained in the act making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1879, may be applied to the payment of such other items as may be found deficient under the appropriations provided for in the said act.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I offer the following amendment:

After line 36 insert:

That section 4717 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I make the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Let the section be read. I do not know precisely what it is, but this is new legislation and unless it is in the direction of retrenchment it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have here the section of the Revised Statutes to which the amendment refers. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4717. No claim for pension not prosecuted to successful issue within five years from the date of filing the same shall be admitted without record evidence from the War or Navy Department of the injury or the disease which resulted in the disability or death of the person on whose account the claim is made: Provided, That in any case in which the limitation prescribed by this section bars the further prosecution of the claim, the claimant may present, through the Pension-Office, to the Adjutant-General of the Army, or the Surgeon-General of the Navy, evidence that the disease or injury which resulted in the disability or death of the person on whose account the claim is made originated in the service and in the line of duty; and if such evidence is deemed satisfactory by the officer to whom it may be submitted, he shall cause a record of the fact so proved to be made, and a copy of the same to be transmitted to the Commissioner of Pensions, and the bar to the prosecution of the claim shall thereby be removed.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. My point of order is that this is new legislation and not in the direction of economy.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am surprised that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, representing as he does the republican party, the vaunted friend of the soldier, should raise a question of order upon that section of the Revised Statutes. It is that section which has flooded this House with bills of relief for pension applicants who are deprived of meritorious claims by the section I desire repealed.

There were eighteen hundred such bills introduced in the last session, and the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions informs me a very large majority of them have been brought here in consequence of that section.

I wish to say further that the Adjutant-General and the Commissioner of Pensions have recommended that that section be repealed. If repealed, we will avoid a considerable amount of special legislation as well as open the door for claimants to obtain settlements in the Pension Office of just claims.

I believe, sir, the amendment is germane to the bill. This question I know has been debated in past sessions, and I believe it has been decided both ways. I know there have been amendments of the same nature offered to other kinds of bills which have been sustained over points of order similar to the one now made. I have introduced the amendment at this time mainly because, owing to the shortness of the session, it is hardly possible to pass an independent bill for this purpose through both Houses. I know this bill will pass, and before the adjournment I desire to couple this amendment to it in order that its passage may be assured. I am sure a large majority of the members here have sufficient regard for disabled soldiers to favor the repeal of this law. Its repeal will allow an opportunity for doing justice to those entitled to pensions. Under the construction placed on that statute by the Adjutant-General's Office and the Commissioner of Pensions no soldier can obtain the removal of the bar it forms unless a record of his disability had been made at the War Department during his service in the Army.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a question of order. My friend from Illinois is discussing the merits of the amendment, and not the point of order raised by me.

Mr. CONGER. I submit that points of order were not reserved on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is mistaken. All points of order were reserved.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will endeavor to make my remarks pertinent to the point of order. Under the construction placed upon that section by the Adjutant-General no soldier is able to obtain a removal of the bar for the reason that officer has in effect decided that he has no power to make or amend the soldier's record in his office, notwithstanding the language of the section is plain, as it appears to me, and makes it his duty upon satisfactory evidence presented to him to make a record in conformity with the facts as proven. The language of the section reads:

And if such evidence is deemed satisfactory by the officer to whom it is submitted, he shall cause a record of the fact so proven to be made.

The Adjutant-General and the Pension Office demand record evidence of disability having been incurred in the line of the soldier's duty, and by their construction they disregard any evidence except a record made during the time of the soldier's service. Such a construction is not warranted by either the spirit or letter of the law, and defeats the liberal and patriotic purposes of Congress toward the crippled and disabled soldiers of the Republic. Many a soldier became diseased in the line of his duty in the service who did not go into a hospital or report his condition to a surgeon of the Army. He may have incurred his disability in prison while a captured soldier. In many instances at the beginning of the war the records were imperfectly or carelessly kept, and perhaps either by omission of duty on the part of the hospital stewards or the casualties of war the record was either not made or was destroyed; and after the war closed there were soldiers of high spirit who, notwithstanding their disability had been incurred in the service of their country, were too proud to become pensioners as long as by manual labor they could keep the lean wolf of hunger from their door; but old age having overtaken them or their disability growing worse, and being thereby deprived of the ability to obtain bread, they have called upon their Government for the provisions so bounteously made for them by Congress; and notwithstanding they can prove by their comrades or other satisfactory evidence that their disabilities were incurred in the line of their duty—the disability may not be thus proven in the technical phrases of the medical schools, but in such language as will easily disclose the nature of the disability—yet because of the construction placed on the law by these officers the soldier and his family are left to suffer in want and penury. The poor soldier may have won glory upon the battle-field, but he is sent to the almshouse for his reward.

I could mention other instances not arising because of this section, where it is believed the policy of the Department tends to defeat meritorious claims for pension, but I will not now go into further detail. The officers of the Government may not be censurable; they perhaps are governed by mistaken zeal. I will leave others to judge of their motives. But their construction of the law renders this legislation necessary.

Now in regard to the point of order, I insist it is not well taken, because this amendment is in line with the legislation proposed in this bill, and it is therefore germane. The bill under consideration is for the purpose of making provision for the payment of pensions. Surely this amendment is legislation of the same nature.

And I desire to say this in conclusion, that, as an American citizen and a democrat, I am proud of the fact that since the democratic party has obtained ascendency in this House there never has been any obstruction made by them to the passage of any bill recommended by committees making appropriations for soldiers. The promptness with which they have disposed of the liberal appropriations for pensions commands the admiration of all friends of the soldiers. There have been fierce contests here over appropriation bills for other purposes in which this side of this Chamber has insisted on retrenchment, but no reduction has been demanded in appropriations for pensions. This side of the House deserves commendation for the liberality and zeal with which it has supported legislation in the interest of soldiers engaged in all wars waged in behalf of our Government, thereby refuting every accusation against the democratic party of want of regard for the interest of the soldier. And I must not omit to express my admiration for the gallantry of members from the Southern States, who, notwithstanding they fought on the other side in the late war and met the Union soldiers as foes on the battle-field, have, with liberal and manly hearts, cast their ballots solidly in favor of rewarding the Union soldier for his sacrifices and services. They have on every occasion come with alacrity to the support of every bill of this kind. It is said the South is solid. She is solid on many things. She has been solid in her support on this floor of liberal appropriations for the Union soldier. The only obstruction I have found in this Congress to legislation in behalf of the soldier has been interposed by the other side of this House.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I must call the gentleman to order. He is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I understood the Chair to say that all points of order had been reserved upon this bill. The proposed amendment I understand to be in the nature of a substitute for the bill. I would inquire of the Chair if points of order have been reserved on substitutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that alters the case at all. The substitute is in the nature of an amendment to the bill.

Mr. PHILLIPS. It is a new bill.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the Chair to have reference made to the record to see what was done. I think the Chair must be mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated in the first instance, in answer to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] that he, the Chair, was informed by the Clerk that all points of order had been reserved upon this bill by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER.]

Mr. CONGER. I wish the Clerk would examine and see if that is so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Journal has been sent for.

Mr. EDEN. I hope the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] will not insist upon his point of order.

Mr. CONGER. "The gentleman from Michigan" has made no point of order. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. EDEN,] in his eagerness to say something, has violated a little the courtesies of the House. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read from the Journal what he has there recorded.

Mr. McMAHON. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is now pending. The Clerk will read from the Journal the record upon this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. A. HERR SMITH, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5484) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1880; which said bill was read twice, committed to the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOSTER reserved all points of order on said bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I am not going to discuss the merits of the bill, or to inquire into the merits of the amendment now proposed to be offered. It is sufficient for us to know that there is a bill similar to this amendment now pending before the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Let that committee do its duty and report as promptly as possible, and then the bill can come up before the House for discussion. I am instructed to press this bill without allowing it to be incumbered with these foreign amendments.

Mr. CONGER. By whom is the gentleman instructed?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. By the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CONGER. Then, of course, the instruction comes from the democratic majority. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMAHON. I call for the record upon that point. I think the record will show that every member of the Committee on Appropriations voted for this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SMITH] imposes upon the Chair the simple duty of deciding whether the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is admissible upon this bill. Without intending to express any dissent from the views expressed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] as to the propriety of repealing the section which he proposes to amend, the Chair holds that unquestionably the amendment is not in order upon this bill, in that it does change existing law and does not formally, upon its face, retrench expenditures.

Mr. CONGER. In order to test the sense of the gentlemen on the other side I appeal from the decision of the Chair. I desire to see how sincere the gentlemen are.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 140, noes 2.

No further count being called for, the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. McMAHON. I offer an amendment which I can hardly say changes existing law, but it may change an existing practice, a practice which I hope gentlemen on the other side will not insist on perpetuating by raising a point of order if the amendment be amenable to such a point. Let the amendment be read. I think it will speak for itself.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. No pensioner's name shall be stricken from the rolls nor shall his pension be reduced without previous notice to the pensioner; and whenever the Commissioner of Pensions has reason to believe that a pension should be discontinued or reduced he shall first give a hearing to the pensioner and permit an examination of the testimony upon either side, and he shall receive and consider further testimony offered in rebuttal, subject to his power to suspend payment during such inquiry. And in all applications for pension or bounty the petitioner or his attorney shall have a right to inspect all testimony or reports concerning his claim that may be on file in the Department.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I make the point of order that this amendment is not in the direction of retrenchment and changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCMAHON] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. McMAHON. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to show me any statute or provision of law that authorizes the present practice.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. It is incumbent on the gentleman to show that his amendment does not change existing law. The gentleman asks us to adopt a provision of law which will change a practice in the Department.

Mr. McMAHON. It may change an existing practice; but suppose the law does not authorize the practice.

Mr. ATKINS. This amendment proposes to make a new law on the subject, therefore it changes existing law.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. The amendment is precisely similar to a bill which the gentleman introduced and had referred.

Mr. McMAHON. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania, on consideration, will withdraw his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on the point of order?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. McMAHON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his point of order. It will do no harm to allow the amendment to pass. Certainly it is in accordance with justice.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. This very proposition is now before the Committee on Invalid Pensions; and there is a controversy between the committee and the Commissioner of Pensions as to the propriety of adopting it.

Mr. SPRINGER. There ought to be no controversy.

Mr. McMAHON. I believe I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio desires to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. Chairman, I have presented this amendment because my attention has been called in my own district and in other districts to what I consider a very great grievance to a poor class of men who under the existing practice——

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, rose.

Mr. McMAHON. I am speaking to the point of order; do not be uneasy.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. If you are speaking to the point of order, then never mind the "poor pensioners" at home.

Mr. McMAHON. But I do mind the "poor pensioners." It is their case that I am after.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Well, I am after the point of order.

Mr. McMAHON. Well, I will put the "poor pensioners" against the gentleman's point of order. Now, there is in the Pension Bureau an existing practice for which I want the gentleman to find the law.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Practice makes law.

Mr. McMAHON. But you say that my amendment changes the law. I submit that when this Government has examined a man's case and allowed him a pension, thereby admitting that it owes him so much money per month under the law, there is no statute or legal provision which authorizes the Commissioner of Pensions to send out one of these pimps called "special agents" to go into the neighborhood of the pensioner and take testimony privately without notice to the pensioner, so that his first knowledge of the proceeding which deprives him of his pension is when he finds that his name has been stricken from the rolls. I repeat there is no existing law which authorizes such a proceeding. If there is, our friends on the other side ought to be ashamed to have made such a law. Such a proceeding takes from a man a right which the Government has conceded to him: a right of property so scrupulously guarded by the law that it cannot be taken from him for a debt; it cannot be assigned by the man himself. Yet this right thus carefully guarded is under the existing practice taken away by an ex parte proceeding on the part of the Commissioner of Pensions. I do not mean to say that this officer himself acts improperly, but he has improper agents. He is obliged to administer the law through defective instruments, and we know that office-holders do now and then get to be defective instruments—only occasionally of course with the gentlemen now in power. I know cases where men have thus been deprived improperly of their right, and I am laboring in this House to prevent such an abuse, or rather I am laboring with reference to the other House, where it is so much harder than it is here to get a measure of this kind through; not because it is a republican body, of course. I am laboring to get men restored to the pension-rolls who have been stricken from them without a particle of notice of any proceeding against them.

When the claim of a man against the Government of the United States for a pension has been allowed, by what authority does the Commissioner of Pensions send out and privately get letters or affidavits from individuals in the neighborhood of the pensioner and then act upon them, never permitting them to be inspected by the pensioner?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Certainly the gentleman is not addressing the Chair on the point of order.

Mr. McMAHON. Certainly all this is pertinent to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Ohio is using considerable latitude in discussing the point of order.

Mr. McMAHON. I am on the point of order, strictly.

Mr. CONGER. No, the gentleman is on the pomt of disorder. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is talking of a matter of practice which has nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. McMAHON. Of course it is the practice I am complaining of and not the law. I would not charge the gentleman with upholding such a law as this. The Commissioner sits up in the Pension Bureau and the gentleman talks to him and says, "It is not nice to do this business, because we will have to develop the names of parties." I say every pensioner is entitled, as well as every criminal in the land, to be confronted with the witnesses against him—if not with the names, with their personal presence; and the idea that we shall deprive these poor men, for whom we on both sides of the House profess such unbounded love, of that right and apply to them a rule of law different from that in every other case is such that I appeal to gentlemen on the other side of the House not to insist on the point of order. I am sure if that distinguished gentleman from the State of Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] who aspires to be the next governor of the State of Ohio and probably the next President of all these United States [laughter]—I am sure if he were here he who has reserved all these points of order would himself withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Why does not the gentleman from Ohio, a gallant soldier, the present chairman of the Committee on Pensions, and as I understand a democratic aspirant for governor of that State—why does not that gentleman report this bill from his committee?

Mr. McMAHON. It never went to his committee until yesterday.

Mr. HALE. When, let me ask, will his committee be called?

Mr. McMAHON. Next Friday.

Mr. HALE. Why did not the gentleman introduce the bill last Friday and have it reported?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SPARKS. Limitation of debate does not run on points of order.

Mr. McMAHON. I understand there is no limit of time on a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands very differently.

Mr. McMAHON. I should like to answer the gentleman from Maine.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. McMAHON. Let me say to the gentleman from Maine this will not pass into law unless you put it on an appropriation bill.

Mr. CONGER. I believe I have the floor and I desire to say a word.

Mr. ATKINS. I make the point that this debate is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so ruled, and he asks the gentlemen who are not in order to take their seats.

Mr. CONGER. In regard to the point of order, I think the gentleman from Ohio will recollect that some four years ago he told this House the law authorized this very proceeding, or did not prevent it. I think it was four and a half years ago, in some remarks he made here.

Mr. SPARKS. He was not here then; that was before he was born as a member of this House.

Mr. McMAHON. The gentleman from Michigan cannot show it.

Mr. CONGER. I cannot remember the exact time.

Mr. McMAHON. It is some other McMahon; it is not me to whom he refers.

Mr. CONGER. It was some three years I believe.

Mr. McMAHON. You are mistaken in the man.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman promised that with a democratic House he would bring in a law to change it. Why has he been slumbering so long?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let me answer. A gentleman from the Pension Committee did bring in a bill repealing this section.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman says there is no change of law. We have heard from him before repeatedly on this subject that a change in this law was necessary, but it is only to-day he asks and urges this be passed because it does not change any law, contrary to his former assertions on that subject.

Mr. McMAHON. Do you want an answer?

Mr. CONGER. I wish to know where the gentleman's zeal has been slumbering all these years that he did not bring in a bill and force it through the House?

Mr. VANCE. I should like to state that at the last session of Congress I did introduce an amendment prohibiting the Commissioner of Pensions from dropping a pensioner as indicated, and it passed this House and went to the Senate. I do not know what became of it.

Mr. McMAHON. It has been slumbering in the Senate, I suppose. The gentleman from Michigan is under a misapprehension. Never in my congressional career have I called attention to an amendment as now pending. It is only recently this trouble has been brought to my notice, and if he will only pay one-half as much attention to these matters as I do, and get his republican friend over there to withdraw his point of order, it will go on the appropriation bill and be a law, and we will all be happy.

Mr. CONGER. I can hardly conceive it possible that the gentleman from Ohio has been so long a member of this House without knowing that soldiers were dropped from the pension-rolls, especially when he represents so great a number of soldiers as he claims. I am surprised that he should not have known they were dropped from the pension-rolls until within the last few days.

Mr. McMAHON. I did not know until then that they were dropped to such an extent.

Mr. CONGER. Must they be dropped in multitudes before attracting the gentleman's attention?

Mr. McMAHON. I had some hope that the justice of the case would have enlisted the support of gentlemen on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist on his point of order?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I do not wish, in seeking the action of the House on the bill now before it, to have it taken out of its regular legitimate course. I do not care what my friend from Ohio did or what the gentleman from Michigan did not do; what I care about is that we should act under the rules of the House. As a republican, perhaps on the stump I might take sides with the gentleman from Ohio; but we are not here on the stump, but as legislators, and we have adopted rules to which we ought to conform, and this is one of the rules which I ask to be enforced by the Chair. I ask the Chairman to decide that this is new legislation and not in the direction of economy. I have no feeling on the question, and ask the Chairman to give his decision on the amendment, not upon its merits, but upon the rule of order. If this bill should come to us from the Committee on Invalid Pensions it can be discussed on its merits.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has peremptorily declined to withdraw it.

Mr. McMAHON. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of moving to suspend the rules to make the amendment in order.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order. The gentleman, however, has the right to make the motion that the committee rise, and to ask that the amendment be admitted by unanimous consent.

Mr. McMAHON. I make that motion.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Before the committee rises I wish to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order pending a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. McMAHON. I withdraw the motion, as gentlemen on the other side seem disposed to fight it.

Mr. ROBBINS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question being taken on the substitute, it was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended by the adoption of the substitute.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 5484) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1880, and had directed him to report it back to the House with a substitute therefor.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I demand the previous question on the bill and amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the substitute was adopted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

QUININE.

Mr. MORRISON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5502) to admit quinine imported from foreign countries free of duty; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS.

On motion of Mr. BLACKBURN, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 1267) fixing the date of commencement of certain pensions and granting arrears in certain cases was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

JAMES CHESNUT.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for passage at this time a bill to remove the political disabilities of James Chesnut, of South Carolina.

The SPEAKER. The bill is accompanied by the usual petition.

Mr. HANNA. Does it come from a committee?

The SPEAKER. It is presented by the gentleman from South Carolina, and is accompanied, like all other bills for the removal of disabilities, by a petition. The petition will be read.

The petition was read, as follows:

To the honorable the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your petitioner respectfully shows that in the year A. D. 1860 he was a Senator from South Carolina in the Senate of the United States; that on the 10th day of November in the year mentioned he resigned his seat as such Senator; that on the 20th day of December of the same year the said State withdrew from the Federal Union; that he took part with the State, was a member of the secession convention and of the provisional government of the Confederate States, and served in the Confederate States army from the beginning to the close of the late war between the States.

Your petitioner further shows that by the third section of the fourteenth article of the Constitution of the United States he is prevented from serving either the State or the United States in any office. He therefore prays your honorable bodies to remove the political disabilities imposed on him by the said article.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES CHESNUT.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 5503) was received, read three times, and passed; two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

MAJOR JACOB E. BURBANK.

On motion of Mr. PHILLIPS, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 947) for the relief of Major Jacob E. Burbank was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REIMBURSEMENT OF KANSAS.

On motion of Mr. PHILLIPS also, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 80) to reimburse the State of Kansas for expenses incurred by said State for the United States in repelling invasion and suppressing Indian hostilities was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JAMES A. BARR.

On motion of Mr. KEIFER, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 1283) for the relief of James A. Barr was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SECTION 4234 OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. REAGAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5504) to amend section 4234 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

L. S. ENSEL.

Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5505) for the relief of L. S. Ensel; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

TAX SALES IN THE DISTRICT.

On motion of Mr. VANCE, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 1344) relating to taxes and tax sales in the District of Columbia was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

WILLIAM B. SARDEN.

Mr. FINLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5506) granting a pension to William B. Sarden, late private Company C, Thirty-fifth Illinois Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ARMY SUBSISTENCE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report of the Commissary-General of Subsistence, showing expenditures of the subsistence department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

MARINE HOSPITAL SERVICE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a preliminary report of the Surgeon-General of the Marine Hospital Service, in relation to the national quarantine act; which was referred to the select committee on yellow fever, &c.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SINNICKSON, for one week from Friday, the 13th instant, on account of important business; and

To Mr. EICKHOFF, for one week.

And then, on motion of Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ATKINS: The petition of B. J. Young, for compensation for cotton burned by confederate forces, which had been seized and used by Federal forces for a barricade—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BAKER, of Indiana: The petition of Nicholas Easley and 86 other citizens of DeKalb County, Indiana, against a further extension of the patent of John C. Birdsell for an improvement in combined clover-threshers and hullers—to the Committee on Patents.

Also, the petition of George H. K. Moss and 178 other citizens of DeKalb County, Indiana, of similar import—to the same committee.

By Mr. BLISS: Papers relating to the petition of William and William H. Lewis for the extension of their patent for new and useful photographic plate-holders—to the same committee.

By Mr. BRIDGES: The petition of the Independent Order of Good Templars of Pennsylvania, for early and favorable action upon the Senate bill to provide for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DIBRELL: The petition of Theodore W. Gambee, for pay for services as adjutant of the Sixteenth Tennessee Cavalry—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DUNNELL: A paper relating to the establishment of post-routes from Lowville, via Leeds, to Adrian; from Currie, via Marsh's, Hubbells, Amo, Big Pond, to Windom; from Currie, via Aooca, Bondin, Seward, to Worthington; from Currie, via Murray Centre, Leeds, Lost Timber, to Luterne, Minnesota—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. HARMER: The petition of Ellen Sherlock, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HUNGERFORD: The petition of F. R. Wagner, for the restoration of the pay of examining surgeons—to the same committee.

By Mr. KETCHAM: The petition of Mrs. Sophia L. Schenck and 61 other ladies of Claverack, New York, for the enforcement of the anti-polygamy law of 1862—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LAPHAM: Resolutions adopted at a mass-meeting of workingmen engaged in the sugar-refining business, held in New York December 10, 1878, opposing a change of the tariff on sugars to so much per pound, regardless of color—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. RICE, of Ohio: The petition of W. Blasland, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 13, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. McDONALD, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to day it be to meet on Monday next.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Chief of Engineers, showing that, as the law now stands, if the office of the Chief of Engineers of the Army should become vacant no appointment to fill that vacancy could be made; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, calling the attention of Congress to the facts in the case of William English, late cadet at the Military Academy, and recommending legislation to enable the President to appoint him a second lieutenant in the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the joint commission on the completion of the Washington Monument, transmitting in compliance with the act of Congress of August 2, 1876, a report made by Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas L. Casey, United States engineer in charge of the construction of the monument; which, on motion of Mr. DAWES, was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a memorial of the constitutional convention of the State of California; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

To the President and to the Senate of the United States:

The constitutional convention of the State of California, duly assembled by authority of law, at Sacramento, on the 28th day of September, A. D. 1878, for the purpose of revising the constitution of the State, respectfully memorializes the President and the Senate of the United States:

Whereas a treaty or convention between the Government of the United States and that of the Republic of France has been proposed, and is now under consideration at the city of Washington, by which convention it is proposed to so revise the existing schedule of tariffs that a large reduction shall be made in import duties upon French products, particularly wines and spirits; and

Whereas such reduction would result most disastrously to the large and growing agricultural interests of the State of California: Therefore,

This body, acting on behalf of the people of California, does most earnestly protest against the proposed revision of such tariff or any revision thereof whereby the import duties upon wines and spirits may be reduced.

And in support of such protest your memorialists respectfully show: that a large amount of capital, reaching, by intelligent and reliable estimates, the sum of $50,000,000, has been invested in the vineyards of California and the various structures and improvements connected therewith; that all conditions of people have engaged in said industry, from the laborer and the small lot-owner to the wealthy capitalist, and that the business has come to be the only means of support to thousands of the citizens of the State; that said industry is not even now largely remunerative, but at best only yields a moderate return for the capital invested and the labor employed; and that up to a very recent period the vineyards of California have had a close and constant struggle to place the industry upon a paying basis; that the proposed reduction of duties will, if carried out, utterly crush this industry, leave thousands without adequate means of support, and aggravate the distress prevailing among the producing classes without the gain of a farthing to the Government or to any person or persons in the United States, except the few engaged in the business of importing.

Wherefore, said convention has voted this protest, and caused the same to be authenticated by the signatures of the president and secretary.

Done at Sacramento, on this 4th day of December, A. D. 1878.

J. P. HOGE, President.

Attest:

J. A. JOHNSON, Secretary.

Mr. MAXEY presented the petition of R. M. Grubbs, mayor, and others, citizens of Denison, Texas, and vicinity, praying for the establishment of a branch of the United States district court in that city, with jurisdiction over the Chickasaw and Choctaw Nations of Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. McPHERSON presented the petition of John L. Lee, late captain One hundred and sixty-third New York Volunteers, praying for the passage of a law correcting the date of his muster out of service, and for pay and allowances from November 1, 1862, to December 31, 1862; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KERNAN presented resolutions of the common council of the city of Brooklyn, New York, in favor of the passage of a bill granting a pension to Ann M. Paulding, widow of Rear-Admiral Paulding; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of Orville Bishop and others, the petition of M. Kennedy and others, and the petition of C. Myers and others, citizens of New York, praying for the passage of a law granting arrears of pensions to the soldiers of the late war; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of Walters & McClay and others, praying for an extension of the patents for the McKay sewing-machines; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. BOOTH presented the petition of James Johnson, of San Francisco, praying that he may be indemnified out of the money received from the Geneva award for losses sustained by him as cook on the whaling-ship Brunswick, which was captured and destroyed by the rebel cruiser Shenandoah; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of James Towle and others, night inspectors of the district of San Francisco, indorsed by the collector and surveyor of the port, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ARMSTRONG presented the petition of Morris Samuelsolm, of Saint Louis, Missouri, praying for the passage of a law correcting his military record; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Morris Samuelsolm, of Saint Louis, Missouri, praying the passage of a law granting him back pay for service as a soldier in the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Morris Samuelsolm, of Saint Louis, Missouri, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DENNIS presented a petition of the scientific and medical associations of Maryland, praying the passage of a law empowering the President to appoint a commission to investigate the causes and treatment of epidemic diseases, and for an appropriation to cover the expense of the same; which was referred to the select committee to investigate the subject of epidemic diseases.

Mr. MATTHEWS presented a letter from General W. Heine, an inmate of the National Home, inclosing the petition of R. A. Colby, also an inmate of the home, praying that immediate action be taken to protect the disabled officers and soldiers of that institution against insults, cruel treatment, and frauds committed on them; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1460) to authorize the issue of certain duplicate registered bonds to the Manhattan Savings Institution, have instructed me to report it with amendments, and if I can obtain the consent of the Senate I will ask for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. After the order of morning business shall have been called, the Chair will recognize the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, submitted a letter from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting a report of Lieutenant R. L. Hoxie to Major William J. Twining, one of the commissioners, suggesting certain plans and estimates for the relief of the difficulties arising from the defects in the main sewerage system of the city of Washington; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 5501) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1880;

A bill (H. R. No. 5503) to remove the political disabilities of James Chesnut, of South Carolina; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5500) to repeal so much of the sundry civil appropriation act, for the year ending June 30, 1879, as appropriates to Charles P. Birkett the sum of $32,505.71, as late Indian agent at Ponca agency, Dakota.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS.

Mr. MATTHEWS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1493) for the relief of the widow of Colonel Lyman M. Kellogg; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (by request,) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1494) for the relief of James M. Wilbur; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DAWES (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1495) for the relief of Frances H. Plummer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WITHERS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1496) for the relief of certain citizens of Lynchburgh, Virginia, and refunding to them taxes improperly collected from them on manufactured tobacco; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1497) to authorize the President to appoint George Glass a master in the Navy, not in the line of promotion; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. COKE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1498) to authorize the Secretary of War to contract with the Galveston and Camargo Railway Company for the immediate construction of its line of road to Rio Grande City, opposite Camargo, Mexico, as a coast defense, and for the purpose of establishing a commercial and military rail highway to the Rio Grande; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Dr. Charles A. White. I do this at his request, as he is a reputable gentleman, but I know nothing about the merits or demerits of the bill.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1499) for the relief of Dr. Charles A. White; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1500) to amend the laws relative to pensions; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Chair will indulge me a moment, I wish to say that this bill concerns the fees of pension agents. In connection with it I remark that I opposed as industriously as I well could a recent act on that subject which fixed a maximum rate for pension agents, under the operation of which, as was anticipated, they refused to act. This bill comes with a letter, as many other letters have come to me, from pensioners, complaining that under guise of protecting them from excessive fees a provision has been put on the statute-book which shuts the door against them when they apply for the aid of men engaged in that business. I say so much in the hope of securing the attention of the Committee on Pensions to the matter, they knowing of course much better than I do what is wise on the subject. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GORDON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1501) for the relief of William Battersby; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PLUMB asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1502) to provide for the temporary increase of the Army in an emergency; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1503) for the relief of Mrs. Adele McCarty; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. EATON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1504) for the relief of Louisa M. Mansfield; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. WITHERS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 5218) to establish post-roads in the several States herein named; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GORDON. I desire to submit an amendment to the bill (S. No. 1082) to organize the National Railway Company of the United States, and for other purposes. I present this amendment by request. I have not had time to read it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed, subject to the call of the Senator.

Mr. GORDON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4414) to amend the laws relating to internal revenue; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. WITHERS, it was Ordered, That Mrs. Margaret W. Peticolas (daughter of John Y. Worthington, deceased) be permitted to withdraw from the files the papers and the claim against the United States presented by John Y. Worthington.

MANHATTAN SAVINGS INSTITUTION.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1460) to authorize the issue of certain duplicate registered bonds to the Manhattan Savings Institution. I desire to say that this bill has been considered by the Committee on Finance and unanimously recommended, and I was instructed unanimously to ask for its consideration this morning, as it is important, if any relief is to be given to the Manhattan Bank, that the bill should be acted upon before the recess. The bill also has the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CONKLING. No one will object to it, I think.

Mr. MORRILL. I will explain it further after it has been read, if there is any further explanation desired.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Finance were, in line 7, after the word "upon," to insert "evidence," and after the word "satisfactory," in line 8, to strike out the word "evidence" and insert "to him," and in the same line, after the word "furnished," to strike out the words "to him;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to issue duplicates of the hereinafter described bonds of the United States, alleged to have been stolen from the Manhattan Savings Institution of New York City, on the 27th of October, 1878, upon evidence clear and satisfactory to him being furnished that they have not been assigned, but are still the property of said institution, and upon the condition that a sufficient number of these duplicate bonds be issued to the Treasurer of the United States in trust for the said Manhattan Savings Institution, to be by him held for such time as, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, will secure the Treasurer of the United States against loss.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. A single word, Mr. President. This bill is intended to make the stolen bonds of no value to the thieves and to retain the security in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. Under the existing law any person in similar circumstances would be required to give bond and security to the Government. Here the Government itself retains the bonds which must be considered equally good security. I take it there can be no objection to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Vermont what security the Government has?

Mr. MORRILL. It retains the bonds themselves in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HOWE. Only a part of the bonds.

Mr. MORRILL. It will retain the whole of them.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read:

A bill to authorize the issue of certain duplicate registered bonds for the benefit of the Manhattan Savings Institution.

CHARLES P. BIRKETT.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I desire to move to refer the bill received from the House of Representatives this morning to repeal a clause in the sundry civil appropriation bill to the Committee on Appropriations, and on that motion I desire to say a few words at this time.

The bill (H. R. No. 5500) to repeal so much of the sundry civil appropriation act for the year ending June 30, 1879, as appropriates to Charles P. Birkett the sum of $32,505.71, as late Indian agent at Ponca agency, Dakota, was read twice by its title.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I desire the attention of the Senate for a few minutes only, in reference to the House bill repealing the clause of the sundry civil bill of last session for the benefit of one Charles P. Birkett, which has just been read by its title, mainly because the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate are perhaps responsible for any neglect that may have occurred in the proper investigation of the claim before it became a portion of the sundry civil appropriation bill. I was on the subcommittee appointed to examine the matter, and I introduced the bill for his relief originally. Therefore I, more than any other member of that committee, may be responsible for whatever wrong or neglect there was in it if any. We desire to have this bill referred to the Committee on Appropriations where a thorough investigation can be had to ascertain whether or not there was any fraud in the claim, as is in a somewhat offensive manner assumed elsewhere; and if there was I can assure the Senate that that committee will join with the House as promptly as they can possibly desire in having the law now proposed passed and the fraud exposed.

As is the habit with all of us, I introduced the bill at the request of a respectable attorney from my own State, in whom I had then and now have all confidence. I introduced it without examination. I did so believing as I do that every citizen has a right to have his bills presented and his petitions heard and fairly examined. The bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations as it ought to have been upon the facts presented, that it was a deficiency to be provided for and not an unadjusted claim. A letter was sent to us by that attorney explaining it, and a statement was also made by the claimant fully setting forth his case. When the Committee on Appropriations was required to consider the sundry civil appropriation bill at a very late hour in the session, I in common with two other members of the committee formed a subcommittee to investigate as best we might all the matters contained in the bill. Mr. President, you may remember that the appropriation bills that came from the House were sent to us quite late in the session. That I do not complain of, except in this, that it deprived us of the opportunity of making that character of examination which would otherwise have been made, and threw upon us an amount of labor and responsibility which was almost impossible for any set of men to undergo and do the work well.

A large number of important appropriation bills were held back in the House for a long time, no doubt for good and sufficient reasons. When the various deficiency bills came to us—and they were numerous—we were pressed by persons who thought they had valid claims to insert them in each deficiency bill. We opposed all such applications upon the ground mainly that each deficiency bill seemed to be a pressing one and only for limited amounts and particular purposes. When the general deficiency bill was sent over to us about the 10th day of June, six months after Congress met, it was loaded down with private claims of every description at the other end of the Capitol. It was of such a character when it came here that the Senate committee felt that they were wholly unable at that late day of the session to go into it and examine carefully each item we were urged on that bill to insert—claims equally meritorious with those passed by the House—and go into the investigation of hundreds of other demands public and private. It was determined by the Senate committee not to do so, fearing that the session would either be unreasonably prolonged or that we would get into such a controversy perhaps that it would be impossible to disentangle good from bad cases. Therefore that deficiency bill was passed by the committee and the Senate just as it came from the House. We agreed, and so advised claimants, that all matters of that character should be considered in the sundry civil bill, so as to have only one bill to confer over, only one bill to examine the items of instead of having two. That decision threw an unusual amount of labor on the Senate committee in reference to the sundry civil bill. Every Department of the Government was represented before it. All asked for matters that were said to be indispensable for the good of the service. The Postmaster-General, I remember particularly, laid before us claims for very large amounts, and so with the other Departments. All the bill that gentlemen thought were meritorious—I remember among others one for a building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, one for taking ground on Pennsylvania avenue at the foot of the Capitol, and hundreds of others of every sort—were pressed by Senators and members; all had to be considered. Private claims were before us, urged by respectable agents and attorneys. We determined to reject all that it was possible to designate as claims, limiting ourselves to the examination of that class of cases which had been certified to as deficiencies by the Secretary of the Treasury and where they had been audited by the accounting officers of the Treasury, and as to those to insert just as few as we possibly could, keeping our own counsels so as not to invite the filing of even that class to any extent beyond what had been already done.

When Mr. Birkett's bill was called up before the committee, as it had been introduced by me the other members of the committee asked me to examine it. I did so as well as I could in the midst of an overwhelming mass of business of all kinds, sitting as we did night and day, rarely leaving the committee-room even for rest, with no means of going out to make other investigations. I remember that I took up first the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, which is in these words:

Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates of appropriations required by the various Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and prior years.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 24, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith the estimates of appropriations required by the various Departments to complete the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and prior years, amounting to $2,723,471.70.

I am, very respectfully,

B. H. BRISTOW, Secretary.

Hon. M. C. KERR, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Among the items of those deficiencis alleged to be necessary to complete the public service assumed by the Secretary to be correct, and claimed as deficiencies which must be supplied, not as mere private claims, by the Secretary of the Treasury, is this:

This amount to reimburse Charles P. Birkett, late United States Indian agent, for amount expended by him for the benefit of the Indians located at the Ponca agency, Dakota Territory, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1874, $30,589.31.

In a subsequent communication from Secretary Sherman was an additional estimate of deficiencies, almost in the same words as the letter of Secretary Bristow, making the deficiencies for the two years about the amount of the bill as passed, sent to us in this Congress:

This amount to reimburse Charles P. Birkett, late United States Indian agent, for amount expended by him for the benefit of the Indians located at the Ponca agency, Dakota Territory, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, as shown by the books of the Indian Office, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1873 and prior years, $1,097.22.

The attorney submitted to the committee a brief, in which are also these papers:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
July 1, 1876.

SIR: Your account for disbursements in the Indian department under your bonds of October 9, 1872, and February 3, 1873, has been readjusted, and by the direction of the Second Comptroller, as per his letter of June 14 and 27, 1876, you have been credited with sums which show a balance in your favor of $32,505.71, differing by $1,175.06 from your rendering, which difference is explained by the inclosed statement.

The requisition for $129.11 has been called for, which, when issued, will entitle you to a draft for that sum.

Respectfully,

E. B. FRENCH, Auditor.

C. P. BIRKETT,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. What is the date of that communication?

Mr. BECK. July 1, 1876, prior to the call by the Secretary for this money as a deficiency. On the 29th of June, 1876, is the following from the Auditor's office:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
June 29, 1876.

I certify that I have examined and adjusted the account of Charles P. Birkett, United States Indian agent, under his bonds of October 9, 1872, and February 3, 1873, and find that under the instructions and recommendations of the Second Comptroller as contained in his letters to the Second Auditor, dated June 14 and 27, 1876, there appears to be due the agent from the United States the sum of $32,505.71, in the following appropriations:

Pay of superintendent and agents, 1875	$129 11
Incidental expenses Indian service in Dakota	30,521 61
Incidental expenses Indian service in Dakota	1,854 99
Total	32,505 71

A requisition to issue for $129.11, under appropriation for "pay of superintendents and agents, 1875," to be paid to Charles P. Birkett, late Indian agent, as appears from the statement and vouchers herewith transmitted for the decision of the Second Comptroller of the Treasury herein.

E. B. FRENCH,
Auditor to the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, (J. D. T.,)
Second Comptroller's Office.

I admit and certify the above balance this 1st day of July, 1876.

C. C. CARPENTER,
Second Comptroller.

The two letters referred to, although they seem to have been filed before the committee, were mislaid, and were not seen by me at least, and I do not believe by any member of the committee, until within the last day or two. But acting upon the requisitions of the Secretary of the Treasury upon the settlement of the accounts as certified by the Second Auditor and Comptroller, and upon what appeared to have been a careful examination in order to test the accuracy of the claim—as shown by the detailed account rejecting over $1,100 of the vouchers originally filed—I did not see how to dispute or refuse to recommend the claim.

That account, disallowing many items, sometimes amounting only to a few cents, is too long to read. I will hand it to the reporter, asking it to be made part of my remarks. It is as follows:

Statement of differences arising on settlement of accounts of Charles P. Birkett, late United States Indian agent at Ponca agency, Dakota, from November 12, 1872, to January 31, 1875, inclusive, under his bonds of October 9, 1872, and February 3, 1873.

SECOND COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE, June 29, 1876. SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE, June 29, 1876.

In addition to these official facts and figures I requested the attorney for Mr. Birkett to give me any information he had, and received from him, in addition to the brief he had filed before the committee, the following statement, which was verified by the facts as far as I had opportunity to examine them; and no man from any Department of the Government, from the Senate or House, or from any of the committees of either, or indeed from any quarter whatever, laid before us any fact which tended to throw any suspicion on the justice of the claim. The statement I refer to reads as follows:

Charles P. Birkett, under an order from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, performed certain work and expended certain sums aggregating $32,505.71 as agent of the Ponca tribe of Indians, saving by the promptness of his execution of said order many thousand dollars' worth of property belonging to the Government, the exigencies of the occasion requiring both the expenditure and the work performed. His vouchers were filed, examined, and passed upon by all the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, and after expurgating the same of $1,175 allowed him the above sum of $32,505.71, and recommended or remitted him to Congress for payment of the same, the appropriation to that service having been exhausted. He has waited long until his heart is sick, although urged upon Congress with a statement of the above facts, verified by the statements of the Second Auditor and Second Comptroller and recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. If such a claim is not allowed I shall feel that injustice has been done a man who lost his arm in the cause of the Union and the Government exhibits an ingratitude of which I think it incapable.

Very respectfully,

R. C. WINTERSMITH, Attorney

Hon. JAMES B. BECK.

We had also Mr. Birkett's statement of his claim. He presented a case extremely meritorious. The agency where he was located was about to be washed away by the encroachments of the Missouri River upon it and had to be moved back to safer ground. There were no appropriations available to do it. If they waited any length of time the agency buildings would be swept away. The order came from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to move it at once. He sent an agent in person who approved of the act. The buildings were all moved back, the money for the work was paid, the vouchers filed and approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, certified to by the board of peace commissioners, approved by the Secretary of the Interior, sent to the Secretary of the Treasury, assumed by him to be a deficiency, and sent to us in the letters I have read accompanied by the statement of the Auditor and Comptroller and the corrections as made; and upon these facts, having nothing else to go upon and no further time for investigation, as a member of the subcommittee I reported the facts to the whole committee, and the committee agreed that it was one of the cases they could not properly ignore. Now, after all these facts, with nothing laid before us but general charges of fraud which are always made as to all sorts of claims, if we were deceived, I have stated as briefly as possible our excuse for having been deceived. I do not yet know whether we were or not, for I have seen nothing concerning it since last session.

Mr. Birkett's statement of his case to us is as follows:

Charles P. Birkett, late United States Indian agent at Ponca agency, Todd County, Dakota, respectfully represents that his claim for a balance of disbursements at said agency, as audited and allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department under a settlement of account dated July 1, 1876, amounted to $32,505.71, out of which from funds in the Treasury only available therefor he received $129.11, leaving a credit in his favor of $32,376.60.

The accompanying papers or exhibits are copies of certificates and letters of said accounting officers showing and explaining said balance of United States indebtedness to said Charles P. Birkett, to which reference is respectfully requested:

BASIS OF THE CLAIM.

It is chiefly for labor, materials, and mechanical appliances used and occupied in the tearing down and removal of the old Ponca agency buildings, over half a mile inland from the west bank of the Missouri River, where it was located, and from whence also was removed all United States Government and Indian stores, live and dead stock, with the large valuable and varied assets of the Indian service. The indebtedness also accrued for and from the rebuilding and removal of the agency storehouses and dwellings, together with all the necessary improvements, enlargements, and betterments, amounting, exclusive of Indian houses, stables, &c., to thirty-six Government buildings used for mills, shops, mechanics' houses, storehouses, military quarters, trading post, &c., as receipted for by my successor in office and shown on the rolls in the Department.

MOVING CAUSE AND DATE OF THE WORK.

The rambling and violently aggressive character of the Missouri River current all along its course, but more particularly in its Missouri location, is well known. In the "June rise," extending over the latter part of June and more than the whole of July, 1873, the threatened inroads of the river current at its inception led Agent Birkett to make strong and repeated appeals for direction and assistance in the care of the grave and important interests committed to his charge as agent there, and the fact beyond probabilities that extensive outlays would be needed for the safety and security of life and property, but could not in the last month of the fourth quarter of the fiscal year of 1872–'73 find funds remaining appropriated for "incidental expenses;" but the Missouri River would not be interdicted in its aggressive course on the agency location, which was less than one hundred yards from the Missouri bank of the flood. Agent Birkett, in view of the onus of responsibility thrown upon him, from his stand-point decided to use his best efforts in the matter, and did so, resulting in the safety and security of all the Government and Indian assets, their safe removal and security not only from peculation of goods but in providing shelter and safety from hostile Indians, whose attacks were frequent and in force.

AUTHORITY FOR OPERATIONS.

When the work of renewal and improvement had progressed in response to our necessities, by the employment of as large a force of men and teams as could be procured, in the first week of August, 1873, the then Indian Commissioner, Hon. E. P. Smith, came on a tour of inspection of the Missouri River agencies, and he and those who were with him for nearly two days examined matters at the agency as they presented themselves, and not only approved what Agent Birkett had done but authorized and directed the completion of roads, bridges, buildings, corrals, and betterments which his judgment and information led the Commissioner to decide on, and promised that funds should be provided either by congressional appropriation or otherwise to pay the expenditures thus created. This, for various reasons, was never done; and when I resigned my charge in the fall of 1874 I was directed by the Indian Office (under the same Commissioner) to assume the indebtedness thus incurred in my general accounts, which has been done, and the result has left me a large amount of debt and financial embarrassment at the decline of life, only to be relieved by congressional aid in a deficiency bill.

TESTIMONIAL ADMISSIONS ON AUDIT.

That the work done, or assumed to be done, has really been accomplished, and at less cost than similiar operations. Also that it clearly inured to the benefit of the United States Government and the Indian service.

It is also conceded that the Ponca Indians, although of the poorest of the Indian tribes, were successfully defended from their hostile neighbors, mainly without outside or military aid, and that when Agent Birkett left the Ponca Indian agency on March 1, 1875, to his official character the Indian assets were larger and of a more useful and varied character (including government comfortable dwellings) than ever before, and I therefore confidently hope to be soon relieved of the debt and consequent indebtedness hereby entailed upon me and my family after a life of hard work and usefulness.

CHARLES P. BIRKETT.

I desire only to add, Mr. President, that I never saw Mr. Birkett. I introduced the bill at the request of his attorney, whom I knew to be an honorable and respectable gentleman from my own State. I examined it, as I have stated, as well as I could during the two or three days allowed by the House, sitting night and day, carefully criticising everything we had reason to suspect, rejecting hundreds of claims, only passing favorably upon those which seemed to have been audited and approved and which seemed to have had the sanction of the Treasury officials of the Government. If we were imposed upon, I can assure the Senate the Committee on Appropriations will repeal the law and unite with the House of Representatives in exposing fraud as earnestly and as promptly as it is possible to do. I will not at this time even allude to the seeming reflections and insinuations made elsewhere; when all the facts are known no member of this committee will suffer, whoever else does.

I desired to say that much in explanation before the bill was referred, because of the connection I had with the subject.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the act (S. No. 1367) to aid in the protection of the public buildings and property against loss and damage by fire.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 5501) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1880, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations; and

The bill (H. R. No. 5503) to remove the political disabilities of James Chesnut, of South Carolina, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ELLA LONG.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] to the bill (S. No. 415) for the relief of Ella Long, which was returned from the House of Representatives yesterday upon request, and on which is indorsed a motion to reconsider, made on the 13th of June last by him.

Mr. MCDONALD. I wish to withdraw the motion to reconsider and let the bill pass.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection the motion to reconsider will be withdrawn. The Chair hears no objection, and the motion is withdrawn.

DES MOINES RIVER LANDS.

On motion of Mr. PLUMB, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. No. 1330) to quiet title of settlers on Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes, be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

METHODIST CHURCH SOUTH.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to give notice that on Wednesday next, in the morning hour, I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. No. 910) for the relief of the book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, reported from the Committee on Claims on the 13th of March last.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a resolution that when the House adjourns on Friday the 20th instant, it stand adjourned until Monday, January 6, 1879; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 5307) to correct an error of enrollment in bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1308) to amend sundry provisions of chapter 1, title 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to presidential elections, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the exceeding importance of this subject alone induces me, as a member of the special committee by whom the bill was reported, to take part in the discussion. But I desire on this and every other subject with the consideration of which I am specially charged, to assume my full and responsible share in dealing with the question.

The great difficulties of this question will be made apparent to any one who will study the history of the formation of our Government and its administration from the earliest period down to the present day. Our fathers frequently approached the subject and have always failed satisfactorily to dispose of it, and to each generation belongs their share of the attempt to continue upon principles of settled law the peaceful and orderly administration of public affairs.

There is an urgent need now to settle this question, and I hold that the present time is especially propitious, because the unusual condition of affairs exists in the country of having the two Houses in the Congress controlled by different political majorities; and therefore a measure that shall receive the assent of both, will have the strongest guaranty of being what such a measure ought to be, a non-partisan disposition of a grave and important question.

We have now reached a period in our history, when the attention and anxieties of the American people are turned to the ways of peace and restoration, not of excitement and war. This nation needs rest and peace, and not further agitation. We need not further alienation of our people, but their thorough and permanent reconciliation. The man who will serve his country best will now seek to give it repose, to allay confusion, and compose strifes. Its worst foe is the creator of new discords or the fomentor of strifes that should long since have passed away.

The occasion of the transfer of the executive power of any government is one of great importance; and the finest exhibition of the triumph of our system of laws has been afforded in those quiet, simple, unostentatious ceremonies wherein we have seen in this very Chamber, the robes of office and power laid aside in obedience to law to be assumed even by a political opponent. There has been a majestic simplicity in those ceremonies which has afforded me not only the deepest satisfaction, but which I believe has constituted a chief cause of our just pride and satisfaction as a people, in the contemplation of our political affairs. There is a great difficulty under any government attending the period of the succession of executive power. The history of such periods has often been marked in letters of blood, and confusion all over the world, and our own country has not been free from agitation; and our difficulties are all the greater because frequently in the heat of party excitement we depend for the machinery of peaceful transfer upon the obedience to law and order of a defeated party. The draught is heavy indeed upon the steadiness and patriotism of men who are called upon, not to yield power to their associates, or to see the forms to be continued in their own hands, but to hand it over to those against whom argument and effort have been strenuously but unsuccessfully made. So far there has been, as I say, great cause of satisfaction in this country, at the peaceful and orderly manner in which such transfers of power have been effected. But it has not always been a period free from anxiety, and two years ago every one felt, and every one who knew the true condition of affairs appreciated, the great danger and the deep anxiety of that period. We approached at that critical period very serious danger, and I hope that this bill may prove in a measure, if not wholly successful, at least to possess tendencies that shall remove, or lessen materially, the dangers of disturbance at a time when self-control and peace and order are so especially made necessary.

I view this bill as a measure tending to peace and quiet, tending to remove difficulties and to restore confidence to the public mind, and I hold that any man who can vote for it ought to support it unless some valid constitutional objection shall stand in his way.

Now, sir, the present bill, as it seems to me, does little more than declare the law as it is generally admitted to exist. It claims no new powers in the Houses of Congress over the count of the electoral vote, but it provides for the orderly exercise of admitted powers. It abdicates no powers of the two Houses. The Constitution of the United States has itself created the entire plan for the election of President and Vice-President and the methods of certification. All the powers, whether of the Congress or of the States, over that subject are created by the Constitution and are assigned by that instrument to Congress and the States respectively. Neither by law nor by any other method save a change of the Constitution by amendment, can these powers be increased or diminished; but so far as the powers of Congress are concerned they may be regulated in their exercise by legislation.

The Constitution provides that "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof shall direct," its number of electors, with certain reservations that those electors shall not be Federal office-holders; but the power is unreserved, unlimited, it is complete and plenary that "each State" shall have this power to be enjoyed and exercised without the interference of any other State or of any other power.

If we will execute this Constitution in its spirit and meaning, Congress will in no way attempt to influence, to supervise, or in any way control the action of the State in doing that which the State alone is authorized to inaugurate and to carry to completion. The State, therefore, may appoint its electors, not being Federal officials, and the two Houses meet at the time appointed by law for counting the votes for the purpose of counting the votes; for there was no other purpose in their meeting. From the necessity of the thing, when they are so called to meet at that important juncture of public affairs, they are called for a practical and an important purpose, which is to count the votes, but the votes so counted are the votes of the electors appointed by the States, and not votes which in any way or in any degree have been influenced or appointed by the two Houses of Congress.

This bill meets my favor because it reaffirms in clear and explicit terms this exclusive power of the States over this subject, it asserts their complete independence of each other and of the Federal power in making this appointment; it wipes out all pretext of Federal supervision over or interference with the election of presidential electors, and confides it exclusively to the State.

There are some sections of this bill that are mere repetitions, or repetitions with amendment, of laws long since enacted to execute the power of Congress over this subject. The first and the third sections of the bill provide for the time of the election of the electors and the time of the casting of the electoral votes by them. The first section of the second article of the Constitution gives this power to Congress:

> The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes; which day shall be the same throughout the United States.

It will be observed that the first section of the bill changes the day for the election of electors throughout the United States from the first Tuesday in November to the first Tuesday in October, and it also fixes by section 3 the time for the meeting of the electors, on the second Monday in January of each year, instead of the first Wednesday in December of each year, as under existing law. The consequence is not to alter the principle required by the Constitution that the same day for the purpose of casting the electoral votes shall be fixed all over the Union. It simply enlarges the interim between the day of the election of the electors and the day when they are to fulfill their function by casting the electoral vote. The other day the honorable Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES,] whose utterances always have great weight with those of us who know his integrity and intelligence, seemed to apprehend danger to the constitutional arrangement of having the election on the same day in order to prevent local or other interference, in the provisions of the present bill; but I submit to my honorable friend that surely there is no violation, in the first place, of the spirit and intent of the Constitution, because the day fixed for appointing electors is the same day all over the Union.

The bill has not provided different days in different States, but the same day for all the States, namely, in October instead of November next, as to the meeting of the electoral colleges. That is now in December. The bill proposes it shall be in January. Therefore the independence of the States that is sought to be secured by casting all their electoral votes on the same day is equally secured by the proposed bill, as it now is under existing laws. But he may say you have ninety days instead of thirty days within which improper influence or interference has a greater opportunity to be exercised. Yes, and by the same rule it will be found that opportunity to correct fraud and error has also been given an increased time. Therefore, I am unable to see that there is any conflict with the design of the Constitution, which was to prevent one State from affecting another State, or management affecting the casting of a vote, by simply enlarging the time between the day of the election of the electors and the day on which they meet and cast their votes. The time, I say, which would permit of improper influence would also permit of the cure of fraud or error if such had been attempted; and, not improperly referring to past scenes of contest on this subject, we all know that it was the shortness of the time intervening between the day of the election of electors and the meeting of electoral colleges that has permitted much that was wrong to be less efficiently counteracted.

The fourth section of this bill provides that

> Each State may provide, by law enacted prior to the day in this act named for the appointment of the electors—

Which is the first Tuesday in October—

> for the trial and determination of any controversy concerning the appointment of electors, before the time fixed for the meeting of the electors, in any manner it shall deem expedient. Every such determination made pursuant to such law so enacted before said day, and made prior to the said time of meeting of the electors, shall be conclusive evidence of the lawful title of the electors who shall have been so determined to have been appointed, and shall govern in the counting of the electoral votes, as provided in the Constitution, and as hereinafter regulated.

This language is in some degree unusual. It affects "to permit" the State to exercise this right. As I have said before, the powers and the rights of the States are fixed by the Constitution, and Congress may neither increase nor diminish them; and I hold, paraphrasing the section, it will be found to amount but to this, to a recognition of that power in the States which it seems to me ought, and by me has always been claimed and declared to reside in them, which is, that the appointment of electors is a State act, that the States have the sole power, unimpeded and uninterferred with, to execute; and by a necessary result, the voice of the State should be conclusive, when uttered through her proper organs, to prove that which she herself has done.

So that there is no grant of power, for grant there may be none; there is nothing but the recognition of that principle which is very dear to my heart, and which I hold to be essential for the perpetuity of the Government, the recognition, the affirmation, which cannot be too often repeated, the essential existence of the State as a State, as an independent and reliant pillar of the Union of States.

I did not intend to criticise unfavorably this language "may provide," but the honorable Senator from Vermont draws my attention to the fact that it is the language of the act of 1792, relating to the filling of vacancies in the offices of President and Vice-President. It would have been the same if the language of the section had been "When any State has provided by a tribunal of its choice for the certification of its ultimate decision in regard to the choice of electors, it shall be heeded and obeyed by Congress, the two Houses when they have assembled to count the vote." That is all that this section means. It is all that it can mean, because Congress has no further power over the subject. But can the objection be made to the law that the act of the State so certified by the organ of its choice shall be conclusive upon the two Houses in the count? It is not, as was said by the honorable Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN,] a rule of decision, but it is a rule of evidence fit and eminently proper for Congress to adopt; for who should indicate the truth of a choice but the party who made it, and alone had a right to make it? Such evidence, where there has been a contestation between rival claimants for the office of elector, is conclusive upon Congress as to the facts embraced in that adjudication. But I do not hold that it excludes the two Houses in joint assembly from the performance of their constitutional powers and duties over the subject, such as seeing that no Federal official shall be an elector, nor that a foreign-born citizen should be the President of the United States, nor would it make a judgment obtained by fraud binding, because a fraudulent judgment is no judgment. Prove fraud, and you have proved that which is a universal solvent and which absolutely destroys the form of fact which it has set up. Therefore there is nothing to prevent the two Houses of Congress from penetrating a judgment obtained by fraud, because that would be no judgment at all, and so far from invading the right of the State it would be a direct decision in favor of the State.

Hence it is, sir, that I see nothing in that section objectionable, but on the contrary I see much that commends itself to my support because it is the reaffirmation of a doctrine which I had hoped would have been heretofore admitted, but which was overruled by the majority of the electoral tribunal created two years ago.

The fifth section provides merely for the preparation and forwarding of certain lists of the names of electors by the executive of each State. That is but a repetition of existing law as found on page 313 of the Manual of the Senate.

The sixth section provides for the orderly proceeding of the count of the vote, that—

> Congress shall be in session on the second Monday in February succeeding every meeting of the electors. The Senate and House of Representatives shall meet in the Hall of the House of Representatives at the hour of one o'clock in the afternoon on that day; and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer. Two tellers shall be previously appointed on the part of the Senate, and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, all the certificates, and papers purporting to be certificates, of the electoral votes, which certificates and papers shall be opened, presented, and acted upon in the alphabetical order of the States, beginning with the letter A; and said tellers, having then read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been ascertained and counted as in this act provided, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote, and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the journals of the two Houses. Upon such reading of any such certificate or paper, the President of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all objections so made to any vote or paper from a State shall have been received and read, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and such objections shall be submitted to the Senate for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, in like manner, submit such objections to the House of Representatives for its decision; and no electoral vote or votes from any State from which but one return has been received shall be rejected except by the affirmative votes of both Houses.

Passing over the mere recital of the language of the Contitu tion in the first part of this section, it will be observed that there is one provision most wholesomely contained in it. It is the exclusion of the pretension of power in the Vice-President of the United States or the President of the Senate pro tempore to control the count of the vote. Nay, further, it provides that both Houses must concur before the vote of any State may be rejected.

My friend from Florida in his speech the other day seemed to consider that this section gave to any one Senator and any one Representative a power of objection fatal or injurious to the right of the State. Frankly I submit to him that nothing of the kind is done, and that this simply provides that objections which may be made shall under the proposed law be presented in writing, confined to the subject matter, tersely and briefly stated, and submitted for summary decision to each House acting separately; but the concurrent vote of the two Houses must be necessary to give any such objection effect. Why, sir, as it now stands, who doubts the power of the two Houses acting concurrently to reject a vote which they believe to be contrary to the Constitution of the United States or invalid? Is not that provided for by the Constitution? Who doubts it? I have never heard any one except those very few, and even they I believe arguing for a temporary object, who held that the power of a discretionary count existed in the single hand and the single will of the Vice-President or the President pro tempore of the Senate. So, then, this bill leaving the power where it is to-day and where we admit it must reside, in the two Houses, to reject, simply provides for the orderly method by which the objection shall be stated.

But, sir, there is a more serious question that follows:

> If more than one return or paper purporting to be a return from a State shall have been received by the President of the Senate, those votes, and those only, shall be counted which shall have been regularly given by the electors who are shown by the evidence mentioned in section 4 of this act to have been appointed.

That is to say, by the electors whom the tribunal created by the State, whether it be the Supreme Court, or whether it be any other tribunal created by the State, shall have, after contestation before them, duly decided were entitled. There the law of evidence created by section 4 comes in operation and controls the question of contested election of electors from the same State:

> But in case there shall arise the question which of two or more of such State tribunals, determining what electors have been appointed, as mentioned in section 4 of this act, is the lawful tribunal of such State, the votes regularly given of those electors, and those only, from such State shall be counted whose title as electors the two Houses, acting separately, shall concurrently decide is supported by the decision of the tribunal of such State so provided for by its Legislature. And in such case of more than one return, or paper purporting to be a return, from a State, if there shall have been no such determination of the question in the State as aforesaid, then those votes and those only shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall concurrently decide to be the lawful votes of the legally appointed electors of such State.

We have had in the unhappy days of the late past, and which I trust have gone by forever, a bitter experience of double returns. Upon the face of such a fact there is illegality, irregularity, and probably fraud; because there can be no such thing as a lawful dual government in a State; there can be no such thing as two sets of electors, one must be false, and one alone can be true.

Now, it may be said is there not in this bill an evil suggestion, an invitation to make double returns? Is there not a suggestion to the defeated party to meet and go through the forms of an election, and send up here a certificate, or a paper purporting to be a certificate, which shall throw upon the two Houses the possibility, if they should differ in political sentiment by differing in their judgments, to destroy and silence the vote of the State. What is the answer to that? In the first place it is in the power of the State wholly to prevent it, either by depositing the power in the highest judicial tribunal of the State, as I may say without impropriety has been proposed in another place, or in any other tribunal the State may select as a fit and competent trustee of the power to declare the truth of that which the State accomplished on the day of election. The exercise of that power, which I believe and probably most of those who hear me believe already exists, is reaffirmed or confirmed by the provisions of this bill, because the power of the State to furnish the conclusive evidence as to which of two sets of contestants truly represents her voice as declared by the process of election, remains to be exercised at her will.

Nay, further, should such revolutionary and abnormal facts again occur in this country as the pretense of a dual Legislature or a dual government in a State, this bill contemplates really but a single Legislature as the lawful one and declares that that set of electors which is supported by the decision of the tribunal provided "by its Legislature" is the one which shall govern in the count of the vote. I therefore say that all disposition to make the attempt by a double return, taking advantage of the accidental political majority of either House of Congress, can be wholly frustrated by the exercise of the powers of the State under the Constitution which are recognized and reaffirmed by this act.

But, Mr. President, there is need of finality. Every human dispute, every human right, however important, must reach a finality to be controlled by human methods. It must be found somewhere. This bill leaves it to the State, uninfluenced and unimpeded by Congress to create that tribunal, and declare what shall be the final decision. That I hold to be wholesome, just, and necessary, and to answer the objection which is urged against permitting double returns. Until 1872 such a thing as a double return of electoral votes from a State had never been heard of. There had been a spirit of honest acquiescence in the results of elections, accepted, received, and obeyed by the American people, that would have stamped with discredit and infamy the defeated party who sought to escape from the verdict of popular election and urge upon any pretense the right to silence the voice of the State itself. Such double returns have been the fruit of lawless military interference by the Federal Executive, which alone made them possible. We must have finality at some point or time, and in some human hand and some human heart and brain the power of decision must ultimately be reposed. This bill proposes that the agents who are to exercise the final power of decision shall be the agents of the State, created by herself, controlled by herself, and therefore it seems that within her own hand lies the measure of her own safety. But if, sir, upon subjects of such importance and vastness statesmanship and elevated patriotism cannot be relied upon to triumph over party demands and personal ambition, our form of government must go to pieces. We come to that in the end. Lord Bacon said that "great empire and little minds go ill together." If self-seeking politicians shall control high powers, which only patriots and statesmen should exercise and be intrusted with, disaster only can ensue, and no letter of any statute will avail to prevent it. Nay, sir, if a sound and upright public opinion shall not compel men at least to the appearance of justice and obedience to the spirit of laws, then injustice will bear its natural fruit, and resistance and anarchy will follow in its train. Nothing is more certain, nothing is more plain than that those who commit or permit the commission of fraud will sooner or later perish by fraud just as surely as that he who takes the sword shall perish by the sword.

As I have said, the differing party majorities of our two Houses as at present constituted make the present time opportune for a settlement. This measure ought to be in the political interest of all parties. I have no right, and no wise man would wish to square such a measure with temporary party exigencies. Nor does it seem to me that we should legislate to meet only a few extreme cases or a revolutionary period in our history. The normal condition of American society is that which we have a fair right to consider and shape our laws in conformity with. Our condition of public affairs for the last fifteen years has not been normal. Such a phrase wholly fails to describe the convulsions through which the people of this country and their affairs have passed. But gradually this country is coming back to measures of reason and of justice, and is weighing the acts of men and parties to see how nearly they accord with such qualities. Reconciliation is taking the place of denunciation. Partisans may seek to stay this tide of good feeling, but they will fail. The great heart of the American people may sometimes be led to do injustice in its heat, but never will be guilty of continued spitefulness. Its prevailing impulses are all toward justice, generosity, and good-will. The late pestilence that scourged some of the Southern States has proved this, and the countless rivulets of private beneficence on one side and of heartfelt gratitude on the other have grown into a great and mighty river of good-will and brotherly affection, in which petty and personal schemes and attempts to create discord will surely be overwhelmed. The absolute necessity of peace and good order as conditions-precedent to solid prosperity is recognized everywhere by thoughtful men and this whole country longs for it and I believe will demand it.

In my judgment the bill before us tends to smooth the path of progress in the wise adjustment of a very difficult and important subject, and I give it my support rather because of its tendency in that direction than of its actual accomplishment.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I agree with other Senators who say that this is a grave question. I hope I am second to no man in this body in my desire for peace and good order and love for the Constitution. I am opposed to the passage of this bill. I am opposed to the passage of any such bill. I say, sir, here, that in my judgment there can be constitutionally no legislation upon this subject. There ought not to be any legislation upon this subject. There ought to be no interposition by Congress between the States and the Constitution. If the Constitution of the United States is defective, amend it, not tinker with it by legislation. I am not prepared to say that any amendment is required, but if it is required let the people of the country determine what the organic law shall be, and not this Congress of the United States.

I said, sir, that there could not be, there ought not to be, any interposition between the Constitution and the States. The principle of legislation is vicious, and why? This instrument undertakes to and I believe does determine exactly what the power of the States is in this matter. Is any legislation required? What is necessary to constitute legislation? To legislate successfully requires the assent of the President of the United States or a two-third vote of each House of Congress over his veto. Can this principle be adopted in this case? Is this principle wise? What has the Executive of the United States under the Constitution to do with this matter? Does the Constitution give him over this subject any power? You seek now to pass a bill, and ask the Executive of the United States to sign that bill, and that bill to govern, gentlemen say not the States, but the action of the States under the organic law of the land. Sir, let us read this clause of the Constitution:

> The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the persons voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate.

That is plain, clear. The right of the States is well defined. It is absolute. It cannot be changed, tinkered with in any way, without destroying the virtue and vitality of the instrument.

> The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] urges as one reason why this bill should pass that it admits a great principle for which he has long contended; that is that the President of the Senate has no right to count the votes; but that that power rests in the two Houses of Congress. Well, sir, a declaration of that sort incorporated in a bill of this character may be true, and yet it furnishes no reason why legislation should be adopted in this case. Further:

> The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest number, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President.

It strikes me that this is perfect. It does not require this bill at all in any way or manner.

Mr. BAYARD. Does this bill conflict with that?

Mr. EATON. If it does not conflict with it, it is unnecessary, is the answer to that inquiry. If it does not conflict with the plain letter of the Constitution, then do not undertake to pass it, but let us stand upon this instrument, which is the organic law of the land.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask my honorable friend, is not the Constitution filled with powers some of which are self-executing, and some of which are called non-self-executing, which require the legislative power of Congress to make provision for their exercise? Is it any objection, therefore, to a law, that it proposes to regulate and make efficient the powers which are found in the Constitution dedicated to a certain purpose?

Mr. EATON. My friend, as usual, has stated a proposition which is true, but this does not happen to belong to that class of propositions. This is self-executing. It is as plain as the sunlight. No man can read it and go wrong if he is honest. It executes itself, and God forbid that we should step between the Constitution and the States when there is a self-executing power here in the Constitution.

Mr. BAYARD. Will my friend pardon me a moment?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. How can it be said that we step between the Constitution and the State, when we simply further the execution of the Constitution itself? If it were a violation, then we should step between them; but the honorable Senator seems to imply that this law is something which stands between the Constitution and its proper execution. If I thought so, I would not vote for it.

Mr. EATON. I have no doubt that my friend asserts a truism; I know that he would not vote for anything that he believed unconstitutional, and yet he may by possibility believe a thing to be constitutional that I believe to be unconstitutional, and which therefore I shall vote against. Each Senator will govern himself with regard to the powers of the Constitution.

Again, the Constitution confers upon a Congress the right to count the electoral votes cast by the several States for President and Vice-President. Is there any doubt about it? "The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted." Here, I beg to say, is a delegated power to some body. To whom? To what body is this power delegated? There can be no question about it whatever that here is a delegated power by the organic law of the land to Congress. What Congress? Not the Congress of 1880, or 1881, or 1824, or 1878, and we have no control over this delegated power. It is a power delegated to that Congress which has the right under the Constitution to count the votes, and I undertake to say that this Congress can make no law with regard to the counting of the votes that will bind that Congress upon whom that duty devolves. The duty of counting the electoral votes of the States for the next President and Vice-President of the United States will devolve upon the Congress that meets in this building in 1880, not this, but the next; and here we undertake to determine a rule of action for a Congress hereafter in part to be elected, and upon whom will devolve that duty. The idea, to my mind, is monstrous that a President of the United States has the power in his hands, unless there is a two-third vote in each branch of the Federal Assembly to override him, to defeat a bill with regard to the important matter of counting the votes for the next President of the United States! The very statement of it in itself is enough to determine the whole question.

Now, what is necessary? Is any change in the organic law necessary? If so, are we not competent to advise our fellow-countrymen to advise the different States of the Union that such an amendment to the organic law would be wise, and prudent, and is necessary? This whole subject with the next Congress will be the simple passage, if anything is necessary, of a joint rule in regard to who shall preside, on which side of the Chamber the Senate shall sit, on which side of the Chamber the House of Representatives shall sit, where the Speaker's chair shall be, and who shall write down the figures. All that is mere matter of a rule to be made by the two Houses and acted upon whenever the count is had.

I may be in error; nothing is more likely; I have frequently been in error, and so have other men wiser than I; but my mind on this subject is determined. My convictions are that there can be no legislation upon this subject. Shall I undertake to put the gyves around the wrists of men who will take their seats in these two Houses a year hence? Not I. Be that their priviledge and duty, not mine. I do not accord to the President of the United States any power with regard to the counting of the votes of the next electoral college.

Gentlemen speak as though there was great danger. Sir, I am not an alarmist. I do not believe there is any danger in standing by the Constitution of the United States. I did not believe there was any danger two years ago when a bill was passed under which the choice of the people of the United States was defrauded out of an office by the illegal act of an unconstitutional machine. The Constitution is the great charter of the rights of the States and the liberties of the people. I do not propose myself to vote for any law, to be a party to any legislation that interferes in the slightest degree with the rights of each of the sovereign States—I know that term is not liked about these days, but yet I use it—of each of the sovereign States of this confederacy of sovereignties. I have no idea, Mr. President, that this bill is introduced or advocated as a condonation of any thing in the past. If I did believe that, I should characterize it with different language than what I now do.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I hold that until, if it be necessary, an amendment to the Constitution is proposed and offered to the people of the United States we should stand by that instrument as it is. No harm can result. My friend says peace is desired, good-will is needed. How will the passage of this bill, in what manner will the passage of this bill bring good feeling either between different sections of the country or between gentlemen of different political opinions? I confess I am too blind to perceive any such effect from the passage of this bill.

Mr. BAYARD. I wish to state to my honorable friend, if he will allow me, why I think it would have that effect. Although the honorable Senator may not have seen that two years ago was a period of danger, of apprehended danger and of deep anxiety, yet there were very many of his fellow-countrymen who felt it to be both. I can recollect when this whole country gave one sigh of relief when the question was settled that we were to have a finality of decision, although it was by a new and an untried tribunal; and I believe, that unless there shall be the assurance that the count of the electoral vote, and the decision of the transfer of power from one administration to another, shall be conducted quietly, orderly, conclusively, acceptably, it will create a period of apprehension, in the face of which, the business of the country, the industries of the country, the occupations of the country, will all stand in trembling silence until it shall have passed. I hold that those periods of unrest, of anxiety, while they do not produce open, manifest injuries which all may see, yet, nevertheless, are fraught with loss, sometimes almost incalculable, by imposing a paralysis upon business and industry which results in the most enormous losses in every direction. To-day I believe the thing that is chiefly needed by this country is confidence that there will be repose, that settlements will be orderly, that business will not be arrested, that revolution will not be invoked; and, therefore, any measure that shall tend to quiescence tends to prosperity; any measure that relieves the people of this country from apprehension of difficulty in the future, which has even the tendency to relieve their minds, should be hailed, I think, with acclamation. It is for that purpose that it seems to me so especially wicked at the present time to add to the natural controversies of opinion, to the natural heats of partisanship, new flames of sectional disorder and of personal and bitter party ambitions. It is because this bill does propose that the way shall be smooth toward a quiet, orderly, accepted, lawful method of deciding a vexed and troublesome question, and that too without in any degree invading the provisions of the Federal Constitution, that I favor it and look upon it as a measure of peace and rest and of repose to a country that sadly needs it.

My friend says we stand between the Constitution and the law, and asks why legislate in regard to the Constitution? Sir, he surely forgot, omitted at the moment to state, that from 1792 down to the present day our statute-books are filled with statutes and their amendments relating to this very subject. Some of the most ancient laws, passed by the very men whose names were appended to the Constitution and who were its framers, were passed for the purpose of carrying into effect this very machinery for the election of President and Vice-President. No man has hinted but what legislation was perfectly legitimate and proper and desirable from time to time on that very subject. The only difficulty has been that the subject has been delicate, the powers involved were enormous, and men felt great anxiety; and until the necessity was forced upon them, they would not seek to decide it at all.

In 1801 this country came very near having a dissolution of its Government from the failure to choose a President and Vice-President, and then it was that the inventive patriotism of both Houses of Congress was set to work and bills were reported to both Houses of Congress on the subject which were intended to relieve from the great difficulty of that decision. Fortunately the patriotism of that day was sufficient to find another method of escape; and then as the emergency passed, the necessity for legislation seemed to pass with it, and the question was suffered to rest in peace till another time arose—in 1824, and again in 1837, and again in 1857; and so on we have gone. We came close up to the matter in 1876, and were compelled to confront this question and find a method of decision. This is, however, in 1878, a time, in advance of any difficulty, to remove the questions of doubt as to the orderly proceeding in respect of this great matter. That is all. I did not say that it removed them in every respect satisfactorily, but I did endeavor to prove to the Senate—with what effect they can best judge—that this was not a contravention of the right of any State nor of the two Houses of Congress, but that it was an orderly proceeding in the line of the Constitution tending to dispose of a difficult subject in a peaceful and legitimate manner.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I am not one of those wicked men, nor do I suppose my friend intended to have it go out to the country that I am one of that class that desire to stir up contentions between different sections of the country.

Mr. BAYARD. Why, Mr. President, it is utterly unnecessary for me to say certainly not.

Mr. EATON. I suppose so.

Mr. BAYARD. No man who knows the patriotic devotion of my honorable friend can believe for an instant that he would stir up strife between his countrymen, but on the contrary all know that he would do everything to allay it. I had not the most remote reference to him.

Mr. EATON. My friend had so mixed up the constitutional question with another question that is before us that it might have looked possibly as though I was one of that class of men who desired to stir up contention in the country.

Now, my friend says that in 1801 it was discovered that the Constitution was incomplete, and patriotic men, honorable men, Constitution-loving men stepped forward to relieve the difficulties of the people. And how? By congressional enactments? No. By legislation? No. How? By the very amendment to the Constitution under which we now live.

Mr. BAYARD. Surely my honorable friend is mistaken. It was the hand of John Marshall that drafted and the vote of John Marshall that passed in the House of Representatives a bill providing for a tribunal composed of members of the two Houses and an ascription of judges from the Supreme Court to decide the very question of double votes.

Mr. EATON. How long did that last? It was found to be as this will be found to be a mere wisp of straw, and wise men, patriotic men, looked for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States that would preserve alike the purity of the elections, the sovereignty of the States, and the rights of the people, and therefore the amendment to the Constitution which is now article 12 is the provision which has governed us; and if anything is necessary now, let another amendment to the Constitution be presented to the people of the States, and let us put this organic law into a proper shape if it be now improper.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why, Mr. President, do I understand the Senator from Connecticut to maintain that, under the Constitution as it is, it is not within the competence of Congress to provide reasonable regulations for the exercise of its constitutional powers?

Mr. EATON. I have not said any such thing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then what is the objection to this regulation giving the State a right to its voice?

Mr. EATON. My friend is ever opportune. If I had presented this matter properly, as I tried to do, he doubtless would have arrived at a correct conclusion as to my meaning. What I say is that no legislation ought to come between a self-executing power in the Constitution and the States, and all that is required here in this matter is either an amendment to the Constitution or a simple joint rule of the two Houses in order to act under the instrument as it now is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it is a self-executing power, what is the need of an amendment to the Constitution, I should like to know, to carry it out?

Mr. EATON. I have not said that there was any amendment necessary. I was very careful to govern my mind and my words. I said that if there be anything necessary it is an amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, if it is a self-executing power, may I ask the Senator secondly what is the need of a rule to carry it out? The Constitution itself must be the rule if it is merely self-executing.

Mr. EATON. You want a little rule to determine on which side of the Speaker's chair the honorable Senator from Vermont shall sit.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not if the Constitution is self-executing, for then the Constitution would place me exactly in the right spot.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, this is boys' play.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it is.

Mr. EATON. I think it is, and if my friend will not interfere there will be one less boy engaged in the play. [Laughter.]

Nobody doubts, nobody would undertake to say, that a rule of the two Houses may not be necessary in order to determine certain little matters. When I speak of a self-executing power in the Constitution itself, I mean in regard to the great principles which it governs, not in regard to the smaller matters which are necessary when the two Houses meet in convention.

Mr. President, I did not intend to consume half the time that I have. I only felt it to be my duty, being called upon, as one of the representatives of the States of the Union, to vote upon this measure; and being anxious now, as I always have been, that there should be good feeling between every section of our country, to express deliberately and clearly the reason why I could not vote for this bill. I have done it, sir, in my poor way, and now I shall leave the question.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, the bitter controversies, the dangers and general public discontents engendered in ascertaining the result of the late presidential election, it seems to me, make it manifest to the observing and candid mind that some legislation on the part of Congress and the several States is necessary to prevent a recurrence of the like if not still more fearful calamities. It cannot be forgotten that in so ascertaining the result of that election open violence lighting up the flames of civil war was imminent, and nothing but the highest patriotism and stern forbearance on the part of Congress and the American people prevented ruinous disaster to the Government. We still hear the mutterings of dissatisfaction and see manifested a resolute and determined purpose not to tolerate fraud and wrong in the future.

I cannot conceive of a subject more interesting to the American people than the election of their Chief Magistrate. It involves their integrity as a people, their peace, their good order, their development, their prosperity, and their happiness individually and collectively. It seems to me, therefore, that Congress will be derelict if it longer delays to make some provision to avert those dangers that every one who has his eyes open must see in connection with any successive presidential election.

Seeing and appreciating the dangers to which the country is exposed and the absolute necessity for some means of safety, I feel it to be my duty to vote for the bill now before the Senate. It presents the whole subject, and one of the first magnitude for the consideration of every member of the Senate. I have the strongest convictions that Congress ought not to allow this opportunity to pass by without enacting some appropriate law regulating the counting of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President. Alarming experience ought to forewarn us of dangers that await us, and that it will not do to delay action until the emergency arises, when wise laws become necessary. We waited two years ago until we were upon the very evil we sought to avert by the temporary and unsatisfactory act that was then passed, and the strifes and contentions that were produced from it have not yet altogether subsided. We hear the sullen mutterings of dissatisfaction on every hand to this day, and there is a resolute and determined purpose in the American mind that such results as transpired then shall not be permitted to transpire again. I seriously apprehend that, unless we shall in a spirit of patriotism, concession, and forbearance do something now, the time is not far distant when the Government and the hopes of the people may be wrecked in transmitting the office of President from one President to his successor. This apprehension has long been entertained by the wisest and best friends of our free institutions.

When I consider the Constitution as an instrument to be construed by legal rules, and look at the history and practice of the Government in respect to the election of a President and Vice-President, I confess my amazement that there has not been in the past some general legislation regulating this subject. I can account for the absence of some such law only on the ground that the constantly recurring contentions and rivalries of political parties and public men in the past have prevented the passage of one. Repeated efforts have been made to pass a law, but without success.

The Government of the Union is a system of government. This system is embodied in the constitutions of the several States and the Constitution of the United States. The Government of the United States is not independent and absolute; the several governments of the States are not independent and absolute. The Government of the United States rests upon and is essentially a part of the governments of the several States, and the governments of the several States are essentially a part and parcel of the Government of the United States. These organic laws, State and Federal, are adjusted and organized into a good system, and the powers exercised by these governments respectively are contributive to the support of this general system. These powers are to be exercised freely and reasonably under limitations prescribed and defined for the furtherance of whatever end is contemplated by our system of Government. The powers of the governments, State and Federal, are mixed; and whenever it becomes necessary to call any of these into operation it must be done according to the limitations and restrictions prescribed.

One material and important provision in this system of Government is that in electing the President and Vice-President the several States as States shall appoint electors to elect these officers. This appears from the following plain provision of the Constitution of the United States. The clause bearing upon this subject is in these words:

> Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

This power to appoint is absolute, except by another provision certain officers of the United States may not be appointed. It does not imply simply the power to appoint, but it implies also the power to ascertain in a regular and orderly way that the appointment was made. The power to appoint is not subject to a higher power, nor can an act of appointment be reversed by any Federal authority. Let us examine that provision and see how it operates. In the first place the Legislature shall designate how the appointment shall be made. The Legislature may provide that the Legislature itself shall appoint the electors; it may provide that a commission provided for the purpose shall appoint them; it may provide that the supreme court or the governor shall appoint them, or it may provide that the voters of the State shall elect them by general ticket; or it may provide that each congressional district may elect one. The Legislature has absolute control over the subject of the appointment of electors, except that persons holding offices of trust or profit under the United States shall not be appointed, and that Congress may designate by law a day for appointing electors and for the counting of the electoral votes in the college. It has been said that the day for appointing electors must be the same in all the States. This may be so, but it is not necessarily so. The provision of the Constitution in this respect is as follows:

> The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes; which day shall be the same throughout the United States.

Now it will be observed that there are two or three clauses in this provision. The first refers to choosing electors, the second to the counting of the electoral votes by the electors. These two provisions are distinct from each other, and note the distinction. Granting that Congress has the power to fix the day when the electors shall meet in the electoral colleges and count the votes, and that this day must be the same in all the States, that does not in any way contravene the power of a State to provide a means by which it may ascertain the result of the appointment, whether it is made by one power in the State or by another. That still remains intact; and it is the right, the duty, of a State, and it has the amplest power to provide for contesting the validity of an appointment. Suppose the appointment of electors be made by the people voting in a State; the Legislature may provide that such election may be contested before the supreme court or before any tribunal established for that purpose.

I beg here to correct an error into which it seems that many have fallen. The extract from the Constitution which I read a moment ago requires some scrutiny. There seems to be an impression that Congress not only has the power to fix the time at which the electors shall cast the electoral votes, and they must be the same day in all the States, but that it also has power to fix the time for choosing electors, and that that must also be on the same day throughout the United States. This latter view is very questionable. The phraseology used does not seem to bear any such construction. The language is:

> The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors—

That is one clause—

> and the day on which they shall give their votes.

That is another clause. Now see what follows:

> Which day shall be the same throughout the United States.

That limitation applies to this last clause, to wit, the time of counting the electoral votes. But this is not very material. My purpose is simply to call attention to the fact that the limitation upon Congress to fix the same day throughout the United States is confined to the day when the electoral colleges shall meet and cast the electoral votes.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me, if it does not interrupt him, to ask a question which refers to his argument on that point?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I would ask the Senator if it was not a contemporaneous construction of the Constitution that the time of electing electors shall be uniform throughout the United States? Has there ever been a different rule on the subject from the formation of the Government to the present day?

Mr. MERRIMON. Not within my knowledge; but still it is not within my knowledge that any question has ever been raised about it. There are many powers in the Constitution which Congress may be called upon to exercise in the future that never yet have been called into exercise. There is nothing, it seems to me, in the letter of the clause in question, or in the spirit of it, that prevents Congress from providing that the electors may be appointed on different days in the several States. While I think of it, let me remind the Senator from Florida that Congress has exercised power to provide that where there is a failure to appoint on the particular day designated by law the appointing power in the State may appoint electors at another subsequent time. The existing law provides for this. It has been done over and over again, and the present statute provides that electors may be appointed at a time other than that which is fixed for the general elections or appointments throughout the United States.

Mr. President, it seems to me, therefore, very clear that without any provision in the pending bill the several States have power to create tribunals before which to contest the validity of the appointment of electors, and that they may do it; they may provide that the supreme court shall do it; they may provide that a commission shall do it; they may provide that it shall be done by the Legislature, or by whatever tribunal the Legislature may see fit to designate. The power of the State for that purpose is plenary and absolute and there is no limitation upon it.

Then there is another view which I may state in reply to the Senator from Florida. The appointment of the elector is one thing; the ascertainment of who is appointed is another. Even if it were conceded that the Constitution required that the appointment should be made on a certain day prescribed by statute, and on the same day throughout the Union, that clause of the Constitution would in no sense in that case interfere with the exercise of the power to ascertain what was done on that particular day. Therefore the supreme court of the State, or a commission, or any tribunal provided by the State, might hear and determine a contest about who was appointed, whether the appointment was made by the governor or one authority or another.

I am free to admit that the fourth section of the bill under discussion, which provides that the States may do this thing, is not really necessary. It is only in affirmance of the constitutional power in the States without any act of Congress. It is merely suggestive; it does not do any harm. It is a mere statutory suggestion on the part of the United States to the several States that this power, this right, this duty is in them to provide by appropriate legislation for contesting elections, the appointment of electors having been made in the proper way.

It seems to me that this power is a very important one to be exercised. There is no more important officer of the Government than that of President; and yet, according to the doctrine of those who oppose the views that I now submit, frauds of the grossest character, intimidations, or any other monstrous means may be used to control appointments of electors, and yet the States, whose right it is to appoint, to select these electors, shall have no power on earth to correct that fraud or wrong, or whatever it may be, which has been practiced in the appointment of its electors.

Then if the power, the right, and the duty is in the State to appoint electors, when does the State cease to have jurisdiction of its electors? That is a very important question. It becomes important in this connection to ascertain, if the States have an absolute right to appoint electors for the election of President and Vice-President, when the jurisdiction of the State over them ceases and that of the Senate and House of Representatives commences. I maintain that the jurisdiction of the State ceases whenever the elector has been appointed and the appointment has been duly ascertained, and the certificate of appointment, the muniments of title to be an elector, have been delivered by the proper authority of the State to him. The State has done its office then. The State in that case, when so much has been done, has elected an agent charged with power to do an act for the State, and not only for that State but for every State in the Union, for every purpose contemplated by the Constitution of the United States, for every purpose contemplated by our system of government in that respect. The jurisdiction of the State, per force of the Constitution, over the elector and his acts having ceased, then the jurisdiction of Congress forthwith begins. Congress has power to prescribe the day on which the electoral colleges shall meet, and by the letter of the Constitution these electoral colleges must assemble on the same day throughout the United States and cast the electoral votes. When the electors are appointed by the State as provided by its laws the power of the State over them ceases, and then their active duties begin. The Government of the United States, the Congress, is bound to accept them, unless in the appointment some provision of the Constitution of the United States is invaded, as if, for example, some one ineligible has been selected. The Congress can ascertain whether the electors, or any of them, were bribed to cast their votes for a particular person, or whether they assembled and proceeded lawfully in the electoral college to cast the votes of the State. When they have assembled according to the laws of the United States, and cast the votes for President and Vice-President, and made such evidence as the law requires of the votes that they have cast, if it shall turn out in any contingency that that has been irregular or unlawful the Congress may judge of that and count or reject the votes. The State cannot reform such irregularities, because, as I said a moment ago, the elector had passed beyond the jurisdiction of the State and into that of Congress, and Congress can reach the evil. Congress can declare that they did not assemble, can ascertain that one, two, three, or four of the electors were bribed to cast their votes one way or another in the college, and reject them. It has absolute control after they are appointed. This is according to our form of government, both State and Federal. The power to appoint electors is in the States until they are appointed, and after that the jurisdiction is in the United States, in Congress, under the Constitution.

I think, therefore, Mr. President, that there can be no reasonable doubt that the right and power to appoint electors is in the States, respectively, and to do everything that is necessary in order to ascertain that the appointment was made regularly and according to the laws of the States.

The next inquiry is, after the vote has thus been cast, how do the electoral colleges and the votes cast by them come in connection with Congress and legally within its jurisdiction? That is another very important inquiry. When do the powers of Congress come into play? How are these colleges put in communication with the two Houses of Congress? That is to be ascertained by the clause in the Constitution which I will now read and construe. Article 12 of the amendments to the Constitution, or so much of it as is necessary for my purpose, is in these words:

> The electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

This clause recognizes the doctrine that I have been contending for, to wit, the right of the States to appoint the electors, and it provides the power of the Government of the United States to take jurisdiction of them after they are appointed and when they assemble in the several States to cast the votes and how they shall come in relation with Congress. After the votes are cast in the electoral colleges then they are to be sent to the President of the Senate. It has been contended in the past by some persons that because they are sent to the President of the Senate and he is required to open them in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, therefore he has a right to count them. That does not follow; that is a non sequitur. Why are they sent to him? The Constitution does not provide that they shall be sent to the Vice-President. These returns are not sent to him in his capacity as Vice-President; they are sent to him as President of the Senate, and they come to the presiding officer of the Senate whether he be the Vice-President or whether he be a Senator as President pro tempore of the Senate. These returns are thus sent to him sealed up; he has no right to open them; he has no right to disturb them in any way, except to hold and have custody of them until the Senate and the House of Representatives according to law come together to count them. He has no right to interfere with them in any way, except only to hold them in safety until the two Houses shall meet as the Constitution provides. They are sent to the President of the Senate, because he is an officer of great dignity, and is the regular and ordinary medium of communicating with this body. In addition to that, the Senate represents the States in their collective and sovereign capacity. The States as States appointed the electors; and the States as States elect the President. It is appropriate to send the returns to the presiding officer of the Senate. Then, again, the Senate is the higher co-ordinate branch of the Congress. All these circumstances point to the President of the Senate, whether he be the Vice-President or a Senator as President pro tempore of the Senate, as the appropriate person with whom to charge these sacred muniments of title to these high offices of President and Vice-President until the Congress shall come to exercise its jurisdiction and ascertain who was elected by the electoral colleges in the several States. There is no reason why he should count the votes. I can conceive of none. On the contrary it seems to me that there are many reasons why he should not count them, to which I need not advert at this moment. But as I have said, there are many reasons and considerations why he is the appropriate person, and above all others appropriate, by whom the electoral colleges should be brought into conjunction with the Congress and enable the jurisdiction of Congress to arise and come into active operation in order to ascertain who was elected in the colleges. As I have said, he is the mere custodian of the returns. He is the channel of communication whereby the Congress comes into possession of the returns made by the electoral colleges in the several States.

At a day fixed by law the Senate and House of Representatives, exercising a special jurisdiction defined and limited by the article I have just read, assemble together. In the presence of the two Houses thus assembled, the President of the Senate must open the returns, and in my judgment he ought to open them all before any action is taken. They are laid before the Senate and the House of Representatives exercising this special jurisdiction. Now let us note particularly what the Constitution provides shall then be done. Let us see. It provides in these words:

> The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives—

Do what?

> open—

Not count—

> open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

The President of the Senate has no power except as it is conferred by this clause. It confers upon him all the power it was intended he should exercise, which was that he should receive the votes, and in a particular place and in a particular way, that he should open them, but no power is conferred to count them. When he has thus opened them I think it is clear that he has then completed his duty as custodian of them. The further provision is:

> The votes shall then be counted.

Who shall count them? How shall they be counted? Where shall they be counted? The act of counting them implies not only the ministerial duty to count, but as well judgment in many respects. It implies the duty and power to determine, when these returns come before the two Houses of Congress in that way, whether any elector was bribed, whether his vote was purchased, whether there was intimidation or fraud, whether there was any material irregularity in the college or its proceedings, whether the requirements of the law had been complied with, whether any ineligible man acted as elector. All these questions have to be decided, and who can decide them? The President of the Senate? He has no power to do it because it is not conferred on him. Is it the Congress? It is the Senate and House of Representatives according to this language, and by necessary implication it seems to me.

But my excellent friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] a while ago said that this was a self-executing provision of the Constitution. How can that be if the views I have just expressed are correct? The Constitution says the votes shall be counted. There is no provision in the Constitution for determining how many of the electors were bribed; there is no provision in the Constitution designating how it shall be ascertained whether or not an armed force compelled the electors to cast their votes for a particular person; there is no provision designating the day when the colleges shall meet and cast their votes and certify them in a particular manner. Who is to exercise these important functions—not only the ministerial, but judicial too, involving the highest and most sacred rights of the American people? Clearly Congress. But how, unless Congress shall provide by statute how this provision of the Constitution shall be executed? I maintain, and have the clearest conviction that I am correct, that Congress is as much bound to provide by statute for executing this provision of the Constitution as to provide a supreme court and a circuit court and a district court; to provide for raising and organizing an army, to provide for creating a navy, to provide for raising revenue. The Constitution provides that there shall be a navy; it provides that there shall be an army; it provides that there shall be a judiciary; but it does not say how these things shall be done, except with certain limitations. How the courts shall be organized, how many there shall be, what their special jurisdictions and powers shall be; how the Army shall be raised and organized; how the Navy shall be raised and organized; how the revenues shall be collected—all these are subjects which Congress must regulate under the Constitution. It seems to me that this clause in the Constitution presents the very case where it is necessary that the power of Congress to pass a law regulating the manner of counting the vote shall be brought into operation, and it cannot be done without it. "The votes shall then be counted." How? By whom? How are decisions to be made by the Senate and House of Representatives? Plainly they must be regulated by statute. It cannot be done orderly in any other way.

My friend from Connecticut said a moment ago that if this position is correct the President of the United States will have a right to veto every resolution and order taken in connection with counting the electoral votes. I cannot agree with him in that view. When we pass a general law regulating the manner in which the electoral votes shall be counted, that is a general act of legislation, like a general law regulating the manner of organizing the courts, which the President vetoes or approves as the Constitution requires; but after it has become a law and the Senate and House of Representatives are assembled in the exercise of the special jurisdiction conferred by the article which I have read under that law, the President has nothing to do with that any more than he has in relation to the exercise of any power conferred upon the courts or any other officer of the Government by general law.

It seems to me, therefore, that two propositions are clear: first, that the States have the absolute right and power, and it is their duty, to appoint the electors as the Legislature may direct; that they may create tribunals, and they ought to do so, for contesting the right of any one claiming to be an elector; that when the elector is appointed, and it is ascertained, and he has received the evidence of his title as such, the jurisdiction of the State ceases and that of the Federal Government begins; that when the vote is cast in the electoral college it must be sent to the President of the Senate because he is the appropriate medium through which to communicate to Congress the electoral returns; that Congress then assembles, and that Congress is the legitimate and the only legitimate power to decide all questions arising in connection with the returns, reaching back to the time of the appointment of electors for President and Vice-President; and second, Congress has power to regulate by statute the manner of counting the votes.

If this is true, then the only question that can arise is, is this bill a wise one? Is it proper legislation to execute this provision of the Constitution to which I have referred? It seems to me that it is in substance all the legislation that could be provided to that end. What are its provisions? After some details as to organizing the Senate and House of Representatives for the purpose, it provides that the electoral votes shall be counted by the Senate and House of Representatives and that the returns shall all be counted, whether regular or irregular, unless both branches of Congress voting separately shall concur in rejecting any one or more of them. What could be fairer than that; what could be juster than that; how could the rights of the States and the people of the States be more thoroughly recognized and upheld than by such a provision? I cannot see that a more liberal provision could be devised.

But there is a difficulty, a possible difficulty, that must be provided for. That is this: suppose there should be two organizations claiming authority in the State, that there should for example be two governors, two legislatures, two supreme courts, and each of these powers claiming to be the lawful government of the State should provide for appointing electors, that electors should be appointed, these should assemble, vote, and send the vote to the President of the Senate in the way prescribed by law, and each of such returns is claimed as the electoral vote of that State for President and Vice-President, how is that question to be decided? The bill provides that in a contest of that sort, in the first place, the recognized State tribunal shall determine who are the proper electors for the State, and if it has decided its decision shall be recognized. But in case there is no tribunal or no decision has been made, then that return shall be counted which both branches of the Congress, each voting separately, shall concurrently determine ought to be counted. What is fairer than that? There is a preliminary question in all such cases to be decided from which there is no escape. I do not believe any means can be devised by which this question and difficulty can be determined in any other way. The bill provides in that contingency, one that will arise seldom, I hope never again, that the return for the State shall be counted which both branches of Congress voting separately concur in saying shall be counted. That is right, that is just, and it is inevitable that it should be so. There is no escape from it, because in the case of dual returns some power must determine which is the true one. How can Congress determine which is the correct return unless it is determined by the concurrent vote of the two Houses, I cannot conceive. And in the absence of legislation, if the vote should be counted in the future as it has been in the past and such a case should arise, and there should be no joint order, and there should be no special legislation for the counting the votes, even in that case both branches would be bound to concur before the vote could be counted, because the Senate's vote is of no higher dignity than the vote of the House, and if the Senate votes that a return shall not be counted when the House votes that it shall, who is to say that it shall be? I have looked over this difficulty in every conceivable way, and I cannot conceive of any other way by which this difficulty can be solved otherwise than as provided in the bill before the Senate.

Then I think it is the only method of solving such a difficulty that would be satisfactory to the American people. If a State must be deprived of its vote it will be better satisfied when it is deprived of its vote by the judgment of Congress than if it shall be deprived of it by any other tribunal, because the States as States are represented in the Senate; the people, the American people, are represented in the House of Representatives.

These are the points, Mr. President, that I wanted to make. My convictions are clear, and being so, my duty is plain. I believe it to be my highest patriotic duty to vote for this bill without regard to party considerations. It is a high duty we owe the Government, a sacred duty we owe the people of this country, to provide for averting the tremendous dangers that threaten their safety, their very existence! But, sir, if party considerations should enter into the judgment of any one, I can see no harm that can be done to parties as matters now or by possibility may present themselves. If the same party in the country shall control both branches of Congress, there will be very little difficulty in determining questions that would arise affecting party interests. If one party shall have the ascendency in the Senate and another party shall have the ascendency in the House of Representatives, there is no means of settling this difficulty otherwise and as this bill provides.

Mr. EATON. Except an electoral commission!

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes. I join my friend in condemning the electoral commission. I am about as hostile to such a tribunal as he.

Mr. EATON. I hope so.

Mr. MERRIMON. I yielded to an emergency when I voted for the electoral commission. I yielded in casting my vote to the judgment of those older and of larger experience than I. My strong apprehension was that the electoral commission was not lawful; that it did not have the sanction of the Constitution; and I apprehended that it was inexpedient as well as unconstitutional, and said so, but I felt anxious to solve all my doubts, and yielded my judgment in the interest of patriotism and quiet and peace and in the peaceful settlement of a difficulty that I trust in God this country will never experience again.

I believe, and I have attempted to show it here, that the Constitution devolves upon Congress the duty to count the electoral votes, and that it confers the power in such a way as that it must be regulated by statute; and because that is so, therefore, Congress cannot confer power upon the Supreme Court, or on an electoral commission, or on the President of the Senate, or anybody or any power to count the electoral vote. The jurisdiction of the Senate and House of Representatives to count and to decide all questions in connection with it is absolute and exclusive.

Mr. President, I feel an earnest desire that this bill or one like it shall become a law. I believe that the best and the highest interests of the country demand that it shall pass. In view of the recent past I feel serious apprehension that if there shall be a close contest in the next presidential election we may then witness a dissolution of the Government and general ruin. I want to see this possible calamity averted. I trust this Government will be perpetual; and, sir, it is a high and patriotic duty of Congress to do everything that can be done under the Constitution to make it perpetual. I desire to contribute my humble efforts to that end. I am sure that in voting for this bill I shall contribute toward providing an effective means of averting direful calamity and establishing a strong support of our free institutions.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, I beg a few minutes of the Senate's valuable time to state a single reason why I shall oppose this bill purporting to be legislation of the Congress of the United States.

Article 12 of the amendments to the Constitution, after providing for the casting of the electoral votes of the States and their transmission to the President of the Senate, provides that the President of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, shall perform certain duties. The question arises there at once what House of Representatives and what Senate does that clause of the Constitution have reference to? You will bear in mind, sir, and so must the Senators in construing this clause, that on the very front view it is obvious that there is an organized House and an organized Senate of a certain Congress of the United States in whose presence these duties are to be performed. The question comes then, the Constitution being silent, who is to judge of the purpose of the assembling of these two Houses of Congress, and who is to judge of the rules that are to be adopted for carrying into effect that purpose? They are there for some purpose. I will not quarrel with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] as to what that purpose is; but we make one step in the investigation by finding that there is an organized House, with an organized Senate, of a certain Congress to witness the performance for some purpose. What that purpose is that Congress that meets at that performance must be the judge of. The way and manner of executing that purpose that Congress must be the judge of also.

Mr. MERRIMON. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. GARLAND. Certainly.

Mr. MERRIMON. I submit to my friend that in contemplation of the Constitution the Congress is perpetual. There is no such thing under the Constitution as the First, the Second, the Forty-fourth, the Forty-fifth, or the Forty-sixth Congress. Congress is a perpetual body in the contemplation of the Constitution.

Mr. GARLAND. That is another illustration of the fact that when a person begins to play with words, in the end the words play with him. We have here all the time upon all our dockets and upon all our proceedings Congress No. 45, No. 44, No. 43, &c. A gentleman is elected to the lower House of Congress to begin on March eighteen hundred and so many more years and for a Congress of a certain number. I took my seat at the beginning of the Forty-fifth Congress as a member of this body. Each Congress has a specific term. We are dealing with the practical question now in hand.

Under the Constitution the two Houses of a particular Congress are assembled to witness this interesting proceeding for some purpose. Where is the power under the Constitution—and if it is not there it is nowhere—to bind that Congress by any certain procedure or any certain rules of evidence prescribed by a previous Congress? It does not exist; it cannot exist from the very language used in the Constitution. It would be a contradiction that does not attend that instrument in any of its parts or portions.

Then, Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina said it was astonishing that there was no general law upon this subject after so many succeeding elections witnessed and counted in this way. It would be a more astonishing thing if there was an act, because it would be a mere matter of supererogation on the part of a preceding Congress to pass such a law, and the succeeding Congress whose duty it is to witness the count could obey it or not as it saw proper, and there is no power to prevent the exercise of its judgment.

In the very first line of section 6 of this bill it is declared that Congress shall be in session on the second Monday in February succeeding every meeting of the electors.

The Constitution says Congress shall meet at least once a year, and in December, unless otherwise provided by law. Suppose the next Congress, which will be the Forty-sixth, beginning in March, 1879, changes the time of meeting so as not to come within this provision, then you see where you are at once; your law is gone with one dash of the pen. What I mean to assert is the broad principle that as to these powers no previous Congress can prescribe a duty that will be obligatory on the Congress that is to witness the proceeding, and it is child's play to attempt it. I am not so sure but what it was for a wise purpose omitted from the Constitution and left to the Congress that should have this duty to perform to say how it should be done. They can do that in advance of the time of meeting, or they can do it at the time of counting. Here is a bill proposed to be enacted into a law to govern the action of the two Houses of the next Congress in the count of electoral votes at the next election of President. Suppose it be enacted now. The first question that presents itself in the next Congress possibly will be, is this act constitutional? and we know that we have questions enough always in this interesting proceeding without piling them up one upon another and inviting dispute and debate between the two Houses of Congress as to the way and manner in which this duty should be performed. The Houses will then have to separate, possibly, and discuss this question, and determine whether this act is constitutional and whether they can be bound by the directions of a previous Congress.

Let me illustrate. By a clause of the Constitution each House is made the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members. Suppose the Forty-fifth Congress should undertake to prescribe a procedure and rule of evidence to govern the Forty-sixth Congress, both Houses, as to contested seats in both Houses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the law now, if the Senator will allow me, as to the House of Representatives.

Mr. GARLAND. I am not oblivious of the fact, and I shall come to that. When each case is presented to the Senate or House, each body would say, "We are judges of this ourselves under the Constitution, and no previous law can bind us, no previous law can tell us what we shall do." But the Senator from Vermont says such a law already exists as to the House of Representatives. Granted; and in every case in which it has been brought to the test before the House of Representatives they have said, "We will be liberal, to get at the truth, and we will disregard these rules and these regulations, and we will permit the parties to go down to the bottom of the case and ascertain the fact who was elected really and in fact." There are half a dozen cases in the contested-election reports of the House where that has been done; and were it otherwise they would not be the judges of the elections, returns, and qualifications of their members under the Constitution. Were it otherwise, they would leave that duty to a previous Congress. We must presume that the coming Congress, whose duty it will be to pass upon the next election of President, will be quite as competent as any previous Congress to prescribe its own rules and its own regulations.

I could, but for the lateness of the hour, illustrate this by other powers in the Constitution, but I think it is unnecessary. I think I have gone sufficiently far for the purpose I have in view, to show that each Congress when this count is made is to exercise its own discretion and its own judgment upon it. That brings me to this point: If an act of legislation cannot bind them, what can bind them? An amendment to the Constitution. I should have no debate, so far as I am now advised, with this bill if I believed it came within the purview and meaning of the Constitution. I believe the principles upon which the bill is based are in the main sound and good; but if it be passed as a law, as an act of Congress, I fail to see in it that finality which the Senator from Delaware so eloquently called for in the attempt to settle this question.

Mr. BAYARD. I did not say the present bill was a finality. I said that it gave a finality of decision as to contesting sets of electors to the States and allowed them finally to conclude that, but that the present bill concluded nothing as to the powers of Congress over that count.

Mr. GARLAND. Then I misunderstood the Senator. I understood him to say that this would be a finality. I am anxious myself for a finality on this matter in some shape, but I do not believe it can be secured under the Constitution of the United States by an act of Congress. It is true any act of Congress can be repealed by a succeeding Congress, but it is true still that an act passed by a previous Congress assuming to bind the hands of a succeeding Congress need not be repealed because it is void; and for that reason I oppose this bill.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina who addressed the Senate a few moments ago [Mr. MERRIMON] seemed to labor under a misapprehension in regard to the meaning of some words that I uttered in my place the other day in regard to this bill. He read the Constitution truly; he stated and stated truly that according to the letter of the law the day only on which the electors should cast their votes was required by the Constitution to be the same throughout the United States; and he seemed to think that there was a very material point in that, because while the Constitution clearly gives to Congress the power to fix the time when the electors shall be appointed, he was of opinion that if the elections were held on different days in the different States it would matter but little.

Mr. MERRIMON. What I said was that neither the language nor the spirit of the Constitution forbade that. Congress has exercised that power from the foundation of the Government, because we have a statute which provides that if the appointment of electors shall not be made on the day designated generally State the may appoint its own time.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I argued, Mr. President, from the spirit of the law. There are many things within the spirit of the law that are not within its letter, and there are many things within the letter of the law that are not within its spirit. This is a familiar maxim of jurisprudence. I say, sir, now what I said the other day, that every reason, every argument that supported the view taken by the framers of the Constitution in requiring that the votes of the electors should be cast on a specified day, are equally applicable to the time when the electors shall be chosen. That is my proposition.

Mr. MERRIMON. Then I understand the Senator to say that if for any reason an appointment should not be made on that day in any particular State, then Congress would have no power to authorize that State to appoint on another day.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. According to your own argument Congress would have no such power, because you have already said that it belongs absolutely to the State. But I am arguing from the spirit of the law. It is a matter of very common history that when the Constitution was adopted it was the expectation of the men who framed it that the body of electors who were chosen should exercise an independent choice. It was the expectation that when they cast their votes in the electoral college for President that would be the first indication of the choice upon that grave subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to say that he understands history to show that it was not the expectation of the founders of the Constitution that the will of the people who were to appoint the electors, or of the Legislature if it appointed them, would not be a moral guide to the action of the electors as to the eminent citizen who should be chosen?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I say, sir, that the history of that part of the Constitution shows that this select body of men were intended to be interposed as a barrier against what was imagined at that time to be popular violence, such as tore down the ancient republics, and that they should be absolutely confided with the right to determine the question of the Presidency for the first time within themselves.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the Senator does not quite answer my question; that is, whether he means to say that he thinks the idea of the founders of the Constitution was that the judgment and opinion of the persons who appointed the electors, selected them to that duty, as to who ought to be chosen, was to have no influence on the judgment and opinion of the electors themselves.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will not go to that extent; but I will say this, in reply to the Senator from Vermont, that a very different idea then existed in regard to the powers and the duties of the electors than what prevails at the present day. I say that it never was then supposed that when the electors were chosen they would be bound down absolutely to follow the popular will as indicated at the ballot-box, as they are now. It never was the expectation, it never was the opinion of those who formed the Constitution; and in keeping with my argument, I may instance the fact that when the framers of the Constitution required that the votes of the electors should be cast on a given day throughout the Union, it was to guard against those very dangers which I tried to point out when I was on the floor the other day.

Mr. MERRIMON. The people may not elect; the governor may appoint if the Legislature so provides.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I know that the governor may appoint——

Mr. MERRIMON. As the Legislature provides.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. But I said every argument that applies to the casting of the votes of the electors on a given day applies to their appointment on the same day, according to the spirit of the rules. It is true the Constitution says nothing more than that Congress shall fix the time, and that the day upon which they cast their votes shall be the same throughout the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. "May" fix the time.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. "May" fix the time; I accept the suggestion; but why did it give this power? Why did it undertake to take away from the States this authority when it left to them the regulating of the mode of the election of the electors? The history of the adoption of the Constitution tells us that if there was one thing uppermost in the minds of its framers it was that the great controversy of the succession of power should be settled on a given day.

And now when an election is held for electors say at the time fixed in this bill, the second Tuesday in October, the vote for the Presidency is determined on that day; and if the framers of the Constitution thought it important to say that their votes should be cast in the college on the same day throughout the Union, it is now equally as important that the time on which they are selected by the people should be the same day throughout the Union, and for the same reason. But I do not argue from the letter but from the spirit of the Constitution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I do not interrupt the Senator I should like in this connection to put this question to him, whether, even on the theory which I believe in, that the Constitution was intended to have the choice of electors represent the public judgment in each State as to who should be the President of the United States, would not the provision that the electors shall vote on the same day be equally necessary? Take the State of Vermont, for instance: the electors chosen on the first Tuesday in November were elected by a body of people who believed, I will say, in 1824 that John Quincy Adams ought to be the President of the United States. If the meeting of the electors was on different days in the different States, and a sufficient number of the other States had voted for him to secure his election lacking only the vote of the State of Vermont, then those electors might possibly have been corrupted to vote for somebody else, when the public judgment of that State that selected those gentlemen pointed to his election. And therefore, I submit to my honorable friend whether the argument for the same day for the vote of the electors would not be equally strong if the public will was to enter into the matter.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Yes, I concede that very candidly. I make no point on that; but I was trying to explain to the Senate what I had stated the other day in connection with this subject, to show that the important point with the framers of the Constitution was that this officer should be selected at the time indicated by the election of electors.

One other matter I wish to say a word upon. The Senator from Delaware, from whom I never differ except with pain and reluctance, in speaking of what I said the other day in regard to objections here authorized to be made by a Senator and a Representative, observed that under the existing practice of the Houses the same result could be brought about that would follow from the exercise of the power given in this bill. Now I do not agree with him in that. I do not agree with him, for instance, that if the two Houses are in joint convention for the purpose of counting the electoral votes of the States that body would be bound under our present law or under any practice that has hitherto prevailed to stop its proceedings upon the objection of one Member or of one Senator. I think it would rest entirely with the discretion of the convention, or with the presiding officer thereof, whether they would stop their proceedings and retire to their two Chambers to decide upon what any two members of Congress might feel disposed to say against the returns of a State.

Mr. BAYARD. Does my honorable friend see any objection to the two Houses of Congress being informed by a Senator or a Representative that there is reason why a certain vote should not be counted, wholly without reference to prearrangement as to how that information is to be given? But if, as I suppose, the two Houses of Congress having met in joint assembly for the purpose of counting the votes, there should be information respecting an irregularity in certain votes, that information would be aptly conveyed to the assembly by some one or more of the participants in it. Now, if there be not only no harm in that, but if that be the natural way in the absence of a provision that such information would reach the assembly, to wit, through some one or more of the participants, what objection can there be to providing a formal orderly method in which those objections shall be made? That is to say, that a member of each House shall join in a written statement, framed according to their own judgment of their objection to a vote. I cannot see that any more delay would take place, but on the contrary it seems to me it would rather expedite and facilitate the business in hand if a short, succinct statement in writing should be made, instead of a long and perhaps diffuse verbal explanation. That is all.

As we now stand, I think my honorable friend would think it perfectly right and proper, if there was a joint assembly of the two Houses, that information of irregularity or wrong should be conveyed by any member of that joint assembly verbally or otherwise. So this bill provides that in a very succinct, convenient, and unobjectionable manner, as I suppose, these things should be stated in writing and signed by two parties. I can see no formidable objection to it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. There certainly can be no objection to the manner provided in which these objections shall be made; I make no point upon that; but I say that it is an extraordinary power, and fortunately we have some experience on this subject. I very well remember when during the heat, the fiery heat of the last presidential count it was conceived by many to be a very important matter to secure the signature of a member of this body to an objection to the electoral vote of a State. I have a most distinct recollection upon that subject at a time when everything about us was full of danger, when I felt myself that the foundations of the Capitol were going from beneath my feet. I saw men rushing wildly for senatorial objectors for what? To interrupt and stay the vote being counted by the other body; and because many of us could not see reasonable ground for it, we were held to be unreasonable, as I know I was by some excellent members of the body.

Mr. MERRIMON. How do you raise objections?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. How do you raise them now? How have they been raised since the foundation of the Government?

Mr. MERRIMON. By orders.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. By orders of the body; but when you indicate absolutely by law that on an objection being made by two members of Congress the proceedings of the joint convention shall be interrupted, you give the power to two men to stay the count of the vote of every State of this Union, though the time is fixed at which it must be consummated. I do not exaggerate when I say that a power of this kind is dangerous in the extreme. It is capricious; it is arbitrary. I have seen enough of the heats of party, and I know how far they will carry men, and especially on an exciting topic like this; and under this part of the bill it would be in the power of two partisan members of the Senate and House to delay and interrupt the count, it may be to carry it over beyond the time fixed for the declaration of the result of counting the presidential vote. Now, I say whatever practice we have on that subject at the present time is better than this, because it is left to the discretion of the joint body. No man will be permitted to get up in the joint convention and interpose a captious objection to the counting of the vote of a State. It would go for nothing. If he had a substantial reason, it would be heard and the bodies would separate, as they have done in the past. But under this bill, it matters not what the character of the objection may be; it may be intended only for partisan purpose, it may be intended only to revolutionize and to destroy; but still the Houses under this bill would be bound to accept it, would be bound to separate, would be bound to cease to count and to enter upon the process, if I may call it, of delay. I say that power ought not to be allowed.

Mr. BAYARD. May I suggest to my honorable friend, if the question were left to general debate of the joint assembly would it not be in the power of any such obstructive person as he has been considering to prolong the proceeding far beyond the time possible under this bill, to enter into a diffuse verbal explanation of his objection or to debate it without end? This law provides that he shall succinctly and shortly state his objection and sign it, and then it is provided that pending the separation of the two Houses and their separate consideration debate shall be limited to five minutes for each person, not exceeding two hours for the entire period of debate. I think, therefore, so far from this provision of objection tending to prolong the joint session and to prolong the time of the count, it tends materially to shorten and circumscribe it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. As I understand the present practice of the two Houses when they meet to count the presidential vote—at least that has been the rule in the past as I understand—no debate is permitted.

Mr. BAYARD. They can separate and stay away for days.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. They can, no doubt about that, on a reasonable objection. I know that in the case of the Wisconsin vote in 1857 when an objection was made—Senators who have read the history of that case are familiar with the excitement that it created—objection was made to the counting of the vote of Wisconsin because the electors voted upon a day different from that fixed by law. Somebody objected in the joint body to the counting of that vote. Mr. Mason was in the chair. He ruled the objection out of order. The count went on, no debate was heard, no debate was listened to there. The count went on; it was consummated. I am well aware that it gave rise to debate in the separate bodies afterward, and a great deal was said there which throws light on this very question; but in the joint body debate is never entertained, and if a frivolous objection were made to a vote I presume the presiding officer would rule it out of order and the count would have to go on. Under this law, however, they are bound to separate. I suppose the presiding officer in the case of a valid objection, if the joint body adopted a joint rule governing them as they sometimes do, would submit it to them and they would separate to decide it.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to say to my friend that that very case to which he now adverts illustrates the absolute importance of a regulation like this. In that case a very important objection was raised.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I did not intend to invoke it against myself. I say that to the Senator. I am not in the habit of quoting authorities against myself. If he can give that construction to it, I am perfectly willing he shall do so.

This is all I have to say in regard to that part of the bill. The section which relates to double returns has given me a great deal of trouble. I have said nothing about it up to this time, and I do not intend to say much now. I think it embodies all that can well be put into a bill on this question; but, as I said in my remarks the other day, the inherent difficulties of this subject are so great that it is almost impossible to devise a law which shall be satisfactory. Under this section any dissatisfied elector in any of the States may send up a double return and may raise a contest upon that return; and the bill goes on to provide that if it shall appear that a contest has been had in a State and settled in accordance with the fourth section of the bill, the votes of the electors so adjudicated on shall be "counted in," to use the expression—the vote of that elector shall be counted who shall be found to have his title supported by the judgment of the tribunal selected by the Legislature of such State; but then that only shows the difficulty of getting at the bottom of this thing. It goes on to provide that if there is any dispute or question in regard to the lawfulness of the tribunal that made the decision, you are at sea. If there should happen to be two governments, two public authorities claiming the recognition of the United States in that State, there is nothing settled. These two Houses, then, have remitted to them the question of deciding which is the lawful tribunal, which is the lawful legislature, and so on, which to my mind is a most dangerous power. We have had some experience upon that subject in the past, and we know how difficult it is to reconcile gentlemen on both sides of this Chamber in regard to differences of this description.

Besides that, you have a statute on your statute-book now, passed in pursuance of the Constitution, which gives to the Executive the power to settle all questions in regard to the lawful government of a State and the tribunals of such State. You have a law there which authorizes the President, upon application of the executive of a State, when the Legislature is not in session, to turn loose the whole power of this Government to sustain the public authority that such governor may insist is the true authority of that Commonwealth, or against him if there appears to be another government which the President deems the proper one.

I am not in the habit of drawing far-fetched cases, but suppose a case of that kind should arise, suppose you had a double government in a State, and this bill contemplates that. The executive of the State, in the absence of the Legislature, addresses himself to the President, and says, "Under the Constitution I ask for aid, and you must recognize me as being the lawful executive officer of this State." Well, the President might act as Mr. Tyler did in the case of Rhode Island against Dorr, he might just indicate by a letter to the Secretary of War that the Dorr government was not the lawful government, and all its authority and its courts would for the time being fall to the ground. That is in accordance with the Constitution and the decisions of the Supreme Court. The President, I say, has that power under an act of Congress now on the statute-book. But the other party go on and say they are the government, and they send up electoral certificates, and the two Houses of Congress under this bill have the same question remitted to them, I suppose as independent bodies, but nevertheless remitted to them for decision; and here we find two laws on the statute-book, one referring the question as to which is the lawful government in a State to one officer, and another law remitting it to a different authority. It is out of conflicts like these, sir, that troubles come. If the two Houses should happen to decide under this bill in favor of one set of electors selected by a tribunal belonging to one faction, and the Executive of the United States, sustaining the executive of the State, should take a different view, you have at once a collision between the legislative and executive authority of your own government under this bill. But I did not intend, Mr. President, to detain the Senate this long in making these additional remarks touching this measure.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I am one of those who believed at the time those occurrences took place, during the presidential count of 1876–'77, the country and our institutions were in great peril. I believe so still. Nothing has since occurred even to weaken that belief. I believed that we were within a few votes—speaking of persons—and within a short time of a condition of anarchy from which no escape had been provided by law, and I believe now that if certain influences brought to bear had not been brought to bear it would be impossible for any gentleman to tell where either we or our institutions would be to-day. So I do not share the opinions of those who treat lightly the importance of that hour. In my opinion, it was the most perilous hour in the history of this country, none excepted.

Now, Mr. President, if I believed that the perils which then threatened had their origin in a confusion in the law, or in any inability to understand the law and our duties under the law, I should be very much in favor of some such bill as this, very much in favor of some bill that would prevent the possible recurrence of the perils which then threatened. But, sir, I should be very uncandid if I failed to say that I did not believe then and I do not believe now that the perils which then threatened us did have their origin in any confusion in the laws or in any doubt about the powers of the two Houses of Congress. Our troubles arose from the fact, not that we had no law, but because there was not a will to obey the law. There was a purpose—I will not say the purpose was confined altogether to one party, but I will say there was a purpose, in my judgment, to have a result, law or no law. It was not because the law was not clear, but because the purpose to disregard the law was entertained. I doubt whether that evil can be remedied by legislation.

Why, sir, the very frame-work of the electoral bill of 1877 is one of the most remarkable confessions of the domination of party spirit that can be found in any country. That bill was framed upon the idea that seven members of the tribunal would feel and vote as democrats and seven would feel and vote as republicans, and the great question was to find the fifteenth man, the umpire, who would be perfectly impartial and whom everybody would be willing to trust as impartial. Perhaps I shall not be out of order when I state that I think one of the greatest tributes ever paid to any man on this continent was then paid to a gentleman who is now a distinguished member of this body, the Senator from Illinois, then a justice of the Supreme Court, [Mr. DAVIS,] because I do know the fact to be that the general belief that he was to be the fifth judge procured very many votes for that electoral bill. Why? Because, to his credit be it said, friends and foes alike were willing to concede that he approached the standard of non-partisan impartiality more nearly than any other gentleman who could be selected. The whole truth is that Mr. Hayes was declared President because eight members of that commission were republicans; and I will show that I do not say that in any partisan spirit when I add that I am not by any means satisfied that if the positions of parties had been reversed the same thing would not have resulted in behalf of the candidate of the other party.

But what I desire to present to the Senate is simply this—an idea applicable unfortunately alike—that the troubles which threatened us in 1876 and 1877 during that presidential count did not arise from any confusion in the law or any doubt about the law, but from the terrible spirit of party which then pervaded the country, and which I fear will ever pervade it, and which will defy all law. I think we are dealing now with one of the most important subjects possible under our system; and the great trouble is that it is almost beyond the reach of remedy by law. We shall have to make our final appeal at last to the people; but unfortunately the people are almost as much party-ridden as their leaders. Why, sir, it has been frequently said—and the Senator from Delaware commends this bill because he says—it settles the great principle that the Vice-President of the United States or the President pro tempore of the Senate shall not have the power to determine the votes or to make the count and determine questions arising as to the votes and during the count. Well, sir, I must be pardoned, but I have never thought that anybody in this country really believed that the President of the Senate did have that power. I do not wish to discredit any gentleman's intelligence, but I think it is just as clear from the Constitution as it is written as it could be from any law that could be written, that he does not possess that power; and if by some process we could compel every man to be candid and perfectly candid, I believe that everybody would confess that nobody believed any such absurdity. But party necessities brought that doctrine to the surface, and many persuaded themselves that it was true. Doubtless they were sincere in so persuading themselves.

Now, I have one trouble with this bill, and my object in taking the floor was to put myself on record on that point. This bill provides that ninety days shall elapse between the election of the electors and the vote by the electors for President and Vice-President. I venture the prediction that that single provision of this bill will give rise to more peril and trouble in the future than all the perils and troubles that now exist. I ask Senators to think of it a moment.

A friend near me says we must legislate upon the assumption that men are honest and patriotic. Unfortunately, that is a very visionary assumption, and men who legislate solely upon that assumption will not always legislate wisely. The Presidency of this country has become a wonderful stake. Its patronage of a hundred thousand office-holders is terrible; and the wisest of all the teachers of mankind, He who is infinite wisdom, said we should pray daily "lead us not into temptation." There is as much wisdom as there is Christianity in that prayer. Now, sir, imagine for a moment what this may lead to. An election comes off in October. Suppose it should result as the election did in 1876, that there should be 185 electors apparently chosen for one party and 184 chosen for the other. One vote would settle the question. Here are ninety days in which all the passions of human nature are tempted into exercise to change that result. It may be changed by force, by fraud, in a thousand forms, at least the temptation will exist, and the period of time to give expression and effect to that temptation will be ninety days.

Why, Mr. President, in the course of human events it is very natural that out of 369 or 370 persons chosen to elect the President and Vice-President one should die during those ninety days, or more than one should die during the ninety days, and death might change the result. Suppose, as occurred in 1860, and may likely occur at any election, the electoral vote of a single State should be divided. Sometimes the vote is very close. In 1860, in New Jersey, a portion of the electors, I think an equal number, were chosen of the republican party and nearly an equal number by the democratic party in the same State. Now, suppose it should happen that in a close election like that the consolidation of the vote of a State for one party or the other would change the result of the presidential election, what machinery is put at work in the State? You say the State tribunals shall settle the question; the State shall pass laws by which it shall authorize some body to determine who have been elected electors. Do you suppose that lawyers will not be found in that State, able and shrewd, to devise many means of contesting the election either of the one or the other, either by one party or the other, for the purpose of changing that result; and do you suppose if a presidential election, with all its patronage of four years and its hundreds of millions of money, depended on the vote of that State it would not be attempted?

Suppose, again, as frequently happens, as exists now in a great number of States, the judicial tribunals, the ones most likely to be clothed with power to settle these questions of contested elections of electors, should be composed of men of different politics from the apparently prevailing party in that State. The election is close. The nominal result, the apparent result, the result of the precinct elections, may declare that certain electors of the democratic party have been elected. The tribunal clothed by the laws of the State with power to determine contests between the respective classes of electors, may be of the republican party. You have a temptation to them to take jurisdiction of the question, as they evidently will do, and determine that the electors of their own party were elected; and if the stake is the Presidency, whom will you trust? I am not saying that republicans would make decisions to suit themselves; I am not here to make a partisan speech. I say that this party spirit unfortunately dominates all parties in this country to an alarming extent; and I am afraid by law to provide ninety days within which these party passions shall have opportunity to change results involving such tremendous consequences.

I know, sir, that for the special reasons given by the able Senator from Delaware, growing out of the election of 1876, it might be reasonable to say that there should be some provision by which a State process might be made to operate upon the electors after they are declared elected and before they deposit their votes. We know in one State, for instance, I think in the State of Florida, in a few hours, perhaps in less than a few hours after the certificates of election were given to the electors, they cast the vote. That was brought about, it was said, intentionally, to prevent the service of an injunction by the courts. But, sir, if in attempting to cure that evil you open the door for a greater evil, as I believe you do by this bill, you do not improve the situation. I confess, for one, that I do not desire ever to see the country subjected to the test of 1876 again. I felt then as I never felt before, and as I trust I shall never be called upon to feel again, that there is an hour in the history of the country, as well as in that of each man in the country, when he should rise above party and remember his country and only his country. But I cannot be blind to what I then saw all around me. Able men, learned men, distinguished men, great men in the eyes of the nation, seemed intent only on accomplishing a party triumph, without regard to the consequences to the country. That is human nature. That is, unfortunately, party nature.

I admit, Mr. President, that there are great troubles around this subject; but I do not know that they can be provided against by law. After all I am not sure but that my honorable friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] is right, that the Constitution is the best law. One thing is certain, the Constitution is a good law, a fair law to a man who is determined to make everything subordinate to obedience to law; but a man who is determined on doing all he can to bring about a party triumph, law or no law, will be bound by neither constitutions nor statutes; and that is exactly the trouble that threatens us in this case. That is the very trouble and difficulty which environs this matter. You are trying to provide by law against the consequences of party spirit, and you are binding Samson with very weak withes. Take the very case my friend from Delaware states. He says this bill settles one great principle, which he calls a principle, to wit, as I have said, that the President of the Senate shall not make the count. Why, sir, suppose it should happen that a similar occasion should occur as occurred in 1876, when it should be important to a party to take the ground that the President of the Senate could make the count, that he embodied in himself more power and authority than all the Congress and people of the United States, and for one moment was the grand Warwick to make presidents, not kings. Suppose somebody or some party should find it convenient to take that absurd position again, would this bill be in their way? No; they would say if that power existed in the President of the Senate it was conferred upon him by the Constitution, and therefore it could not be taken away from him by your legislation. If they found it convenient to put that construction on the Constitution, they would easily find it convenient to say that you could not by legislation take away that construction; and therefore what would your bill be worth? Nothing. Still there are some provisions in this bill which I like, and I would be glad if a bill could be framed which would remedy all the difficulties. I have thought on the subject a great deal during the last two years, but I confess, after giving the subject all the attention and consideration I have, I found myself coming to the conclusion that at last we are utterly impotent to bind men by law who want power, and who are going to have power law or no law. That is the trouble in the case, and probably the Constitution is as good a law as we can get, and if you do not obey that you will not obey any, and if you do not understand that you will understand none, because I do not see myself how human language can make the matter clearer than the Constitution is on these various subjects.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss this bill at all. I shall content myself with voting against it, and without troubling the Senate with the reasons that bring me to this conclusion, I rise simply to express the hope that as soon as possible we may come to a vote.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not propose at this late hour of the afternoon to discuss the pending measure. I propose to vote for it because, after several years' attempt to reconcile conflicting theories, the best minds which the Senate has been able to charge with the duty have reported that this is the best measure which they can devise to remove the present evil. The evil, however, is essential and inevitable after any legislation may have been adopted, which arises from the construction of the Constitution, which I think the correct construction of the Constitution, which was put upon it by the consent of a large majority of both parties at the time of the last presidential election. I could not believe that the framers of our Constitution, jealous as they were of power, jealous as they were of executive power, could have intended to intrust the grave questions which might arise during the count of a presidential vote to the determination of a single officer who, as the Constitution was originally framed, must have been one of the two last candidates for the Presidency, and in all probability under their habit of continuing the same men in public service, would be one of the candidates whose election was to be determined by the count. The only other alternative was the construction adopted, which imposed the power and duty of determining these questions upon two equal bodies, who could not therefore act by a majority, who would frequently be of different political parties, and whose difference must of course be expected to occur frequently in practice.

Now, it does not seem to me that this bill or that any bill has removed the essential difficulty which grows out of that oversight made by the framers of the Constitution. This bill provides that when, in regard to the votes returned from any State by two bodies claiming to have the right to make the return from the State, there is a difference of opinion, neither vote shall be counted. I cannot understand, I never could understand, how that could be called a count of the vote for the Presidency, when the counting power simply said they were unable to determine what individuals made up the aggregate which was to be counted. How can you count the number of votes when all you have said is that there are ninety partly for one man and partly for another, and that there are ten which you cannot determine whether they belong to the aggregate to be counted or not? That difficulty is untouched by the pending bill, and it cannot in the nature of the case be removed except by a constitutional amendment which gives to one authority, and not to the concurrence of two authorities, the power of determining these questions.

I think also that it is very unwise for the American people to leave in a body numerous and constituted like the House of Representatives, I am not sure that it is not unwise to leave in a body as numerous and constituted as is the Senate, the power of taking any part in such a decision. These bodies are liable to be affected by the tempest of excitement which prevails in the country at the time of a disputed presidential succession. They are bodies comprised, from their very nature, of men selected by political parties and representing political parties and the leaders and guides of political parties. The experience of the electoral count has shown that such men, however eminent for ability, for integrity, for public spirit, for patriotism, become largely incapable of the judicial function in the presence of such questions as these.

As I have said, I propose to vote for the bill mainly because the Senators to whom has been delegated the duty of preparing it, after long examination of the subject, have determined that for the present emergency it is the best measure which can be devised; but I desired to put on record my opinion that very little has been accomplished, and that very little can be accomplished until the public mind has reached a condition which makes a constitutional amendment possible.

Mr. EDMUNDS. At this late hour of the day I think I should trespass upon the time of the Senate and upon its judgment if I were to say anything further in support of this bill. The objections that have been made to it recognize, I think in every instance, the principle upon which the bill is founded, and that is the right of each State to determine for itself the choice of its electors. All that follows is the regulative method of going through with the administrative act of counting the votes which the States have sent to the national capital to express their choice for President of the United States.

In that state of the case I think I should waste the time of the Senate now by going into a criticism and an answer of the particular points that have been made as to the scope of the regulative power. I need only say that in those clauses of the Constitution where without any question, as there is about this, a complete jurisdiction has been invested in the Supreme Court, for instance in the deposit of the judicial power, there has never been any question, as numerous decisions of the court itself, most jealous of its rights, have shown, that it was within the constitutional function of Congress to regulate its procedure, to determine what evidence should be conclusive in that court, and in what ways and under what circumstances it should exercise its jurisdiction.

That being the present state of the case, Mr. President, I do not feel justified in going over this field again, but only ask the Senate in that spirit of conservative patriotism that I know animates all of its members, whether they agree with this bill or not, to provide a definite and lawful means of ascertaining the result of the choice of the States in cases of this character.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Vermont please explain why the election of presidential electors is changed from the Tuesday after the first Monday in November to the first Tuesday in October? I call his attention to the fact that the constitutions of a large number of States, for example, Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska, Nevada, New York, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Virginia, Wisconsin, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Kansas, and probably others, require the election of State officers to be on the Tuesday after the first Monday in November. This will change the time of the elections in all those States. Is there not time enough for the settlement of all contested elections of electors for President and Vice-President after the Tuesday following the first Monday in November and before the time designated in January?

Mr. EDMUNDS. In reply to my honorable friend from Missouri I will say that the committee most carefully and industriously considered the very question to which the Senator refers; and I believe I am safe in saying that every member of the committee, whatever were our differences in respect of methods and so on, agreed in the idea that upon the principle of the bill it was essential to its safety as a practical measure, in order that there might not be, as there was in Florida, the mere turn of a day almost, or of a week, or of a month, in respect of the ability of the State tribunals to dispose of the question which might determine its voice one way or the other. We were all of opinion, I think I am safe in saying, that it was desirable to give the longest possible time in order that questions relating to the very right of the State itself to choose its electors should be decided in that State, and not remitted for an undecided consideration here. So I believe I am safe in saying, as I do say, that all the gentlemen of the committee thought it was necessary to give the longest possible time, which amounts practically to three months.

Now, then, in respect of the State elections, what the Senator says it true as to the States he has named and, as he says, possibly as to some others. As to many of the other States, my own for instance, the election of State officers is on the first Tuesday of September, and we are required on every occasion, as we have been for a great many years, to have an election for presidential electors on one day and an election for State officers on another. That is an inconvenience, undoubtedly, but is an inconvenience after all that has some compensating benefits. If you eliminate the election of President of the United States from every local consideration, the combinations about local strifes and so on, theoretically and in a considerable degree practically you do get I think a larger and better judgment upon that single question than you would if you had the election of electors of President on the same day as that of the State officers. It is undoubtedly a certain inconvenience to every farmer, and artisan, and lawyer, and mechanic, and doctor, and everybody else who makes up the voting community of a State, to go out on two days in the year when they might do all the business at one time; but the leading idea of the committee was to make the space of time between the appointment of the electors and the meeting of the electors so great as that no State would find itself embarrassed in going through all the processes of its own declaration and provision for ascertaining what its own will was under the Constitution for itself. That is the only answer I can give to my honorable friend.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator also answer me what the committee means by the use of the word "vacancy" in section 2:

Whenever there shall be a vacancy in both the offices of the President and Vice-President occurring more than two months, &c., the Secretary of State shall forthwith cause a notification thereof to be made to the executive of every State.

Would that include a case where there should be a failure to elect by the people or a failure by the House of Representatives to choose the President in the mode prescribed by the Constitution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know, Mr. President, that I can answer precisely, certainly not for the committee, what would be the construction of the law in that state of affairs. The Constitution, as the honorable Senator is perfectly well aware, provides that Congress may by law determine what officers shall exercise the office of President of the United States when there is a vacancy in both the offices of President and Vice-President; and the committee only followed the provisions that the fathers made in 1792 for a case where the offices of President and Vice-President were both vacant. They provided, if the Senator will pardon me a moment——

Mr. COCKRELL. Permit me to call the Senator's attention to one fact. Although he is exceedingly accurate all the time, I desire to call his attention directly to this clause of the Constitution:

In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President, and the Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice-President, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

The word "vacancy" does not occur there. Now the act of 1792 followed precisely, in the ninth section, the language of the Constitution.

In case of removal, death, resignation, or inability of both the President and Vice-President of the United States, the President of the Senate, or, if there is none, then the Speaker of the House of Representatives for the time being, shall act as President until the disability is removed or a President elected.

Section 10 of the act of 1792 provided that—

Whenever the offices of President and Vice-President both become vacant, &c.

That law did not say anything in regard to the cause of the vacancy, and I wanted to know what was meant by the term "vacancy" here. If it means only the four cases designated in the Constitution, removal, death, resignation, or inability, then it is clearly within the purview of the Constitution. If it means some other case, as a failure to elect, where Congress cannot determine who has been elected, or the House cannot elect any one when it comes to them, it is an entirely different matter, and I wanted to know what this bill meant precisely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The only answer that can be given to that is, that the Senator has stated the Constitution as he has read it just as it is. That appeared to exhaust most if not all the cases of a vacancy. The act of 1792, made by the very men in a large degree who framed the Constitution itself, uses these words:

In case of removal, death, resignation, or inability of both the President and Vice-President of the United States, the President of the Senate, &c.

Then we come to section 147 of the Revised Statutes, which is the next section of the act of 1792:

Whenever the offices of President and Vice-President both become vacant, the Secretary of State shall forthwith cause a notification thereof to be made to the executive of every State, and shall also cause the same to be published in at least one of the newspapers printed in each State.

My own opinion, but I do not speak for the committee, is that the construction of this act will be exactly the same as that of the act of 1792, and then that raises undoubtedly the same question that the Senator now raises. But the committee thought that in respect of a provision of this kind which had been made, it would not introduce new difficulties, and new discussions, and new doubts to be solved, by taking any other language than that which the fathers of the Government and the enactors of the law of 1792 employed in providing for a complete vacancy in both these offices. Undoubtedly if the House of Representatives, in the case supposed in the Constitution, should fail to elect by the time the term was to begin any one to be President of the United States, there would be a vacancy in that office. There can be no question of that. It would be a vacancy if the House of Representatives had failed to elect in a case of that kind, not by death, where the old officer had held till the 4th of March, not by resignation, not by removal; that is true enough; but there would be a vacancy in the office. Whether it is under the Constitution within the power of the States of this Union to elect a President in that case, I am not prepared to decide. I only am prepared to say that the committee felt justified in following the language of the fathers who made the Constitution, in providing for an emergency of that character. If it will not stand the test of constitutional criticism, and I can see that some strong arguments can be made that way, then of course an election made under such circumstances would not meet the judgment of either House of Congress, as they are the judges I must presume, and if it did not, then the officer designated by law would continue to administer the Government, the President pro tempore of the Senate or the Speaker of the House of Representatives, until the period of four years should have terminated and the new election for the regular term would have occurred. It is, of course, impossible to solve absolutely the critical doubt that my friend so well raises upon this language of the Constitution, which only speaks of death, resignation, removal, &c., in any satisfactory way. At least I am not able to do it; but the committee in this respect have not introduced any new law; they have only left the law by re-enactment exactly as it stands now.

Mr. THURMAN. I cannot let the remark made by the Senator from Vermont pass without calling his attention to a view of the Constitution that I am apprehensive has escaped his notice. If the House of Representatives should fail to elect a President, were the election to devolve on the House, there is but one way that I know of in which under the terms of the Constitution the office could devolve upon the Vice-President or Congress could provide who should fill that office, and that is by the interpretation or construction that shall be put upon the words "removal of the President from office:"

In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President, and the Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice-President.

The case of a failure of the House of Representatives to elect is not a case of death, resignation, or inability, but the words "removal of the President from office" may be construed to be a removal by efflux of time, by the expiration of the time for which he was elected.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. THURMAN. Let me proceed, for I do not want to prolong this debate; I will not occupy five minutes. Suppose that the election of a President devolved upon the House of Representatives and the election of a Vice-President devolved upon the Senate, and the House should fail to elect, but the Senate should elect a Vice-President, then it seems to me that under the Constitution, construed as I have suggested, it may be that the Vice-President elected by the Senate would become the President of the United States, just as in other cases, just as in the case of the death of the President; and so if neither body should elect, if the House should fail to elect a President and the Senate should fail to elect a Vice-President—a very extraordinary supposition that would be—still, the old incumbent being removed from office by efflux of time, Congress might provide in such a case as that who should discharge the duties until there could be an election.

Mr. COCKRELL. I simply desired to read to the Senator from Ohio the language of the Constitution in the twelfth article of amendment, which would have saved the necessity of most of his remarks:

And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the 4th day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.

The Constitution makes express provision where the House of Representatives fail to elect, but there is no provision made where Congress itself shall fail to make any determination as to whether any one is elected or not; but when the election goes properly into the House under the plain provisions of the Constitution and the House fail to elect or refuse to perform that duty prior to a certain day, then the Vice-President elected by the Senate, if not chosen in the general election, becomes the President. There is no provision made where the Senate shall fail to elect a Vice-President. Those are the two cases for which no provision is made, and I wanted to know whether this bill provided for those two cases and embraced them in the term "vacancy" or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The committee went over the whole of that very ground and it presented, in the strictest philosophical nature of the case, an insoluble problem. The committee did not think, in view of another provision of the Constitution that the President might be removed for high crimes and misdemeanors, &c., that you could say he was removed from office by the fact that his term expired. The committee therefore merely took the law as they found it enacted by the fathers to provide for a general vacancy, which in all its terms would include the case that the Senator has mentioned. But it is one of those discussions which relate to a state of circumstances that is so unlikely to occur that the committee thought the best they could do would be to leave the law on that point just as the makers of the Constitution left it when they passed the law of 1792, using the general term "vacancy."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) The Senator from Florida [Mr. CONOVER] is detained from the Senate to-day on account of serious illness in his family. He requested me to pair with him, which I did. If he were here, I am informed he would vote for the bill, and I should vote against it.

Mr. McPHERSON, (when his name was called.) Upon this question I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] who is unable to be here. Were he here, I should vote in the affirmative and he would vote in the negative.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the call of the roll.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have not voted, and I ask simply to make one word of explanation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent to make a word of explanation. Is there objection?

Mr. WITHERS. Yes, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and it will not be in order.

The result was then announced—yeas 35, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—35.

Allison,	Conkling,	Kellogg,	Paddock,
Anthony,	Davis of Illinois,	Kirkwood,	Patterson,
Bayard,	Dawes,	McMillan,	Plumb,
Blaine,	Edmunds,	Matthews,	Rollins,
Booth,	Ferry,	Merrimon,	Saunders,
Burnside,	Hamlin,	Mitchell,	Teller,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hoar,	Morgan,	Wadleigh,
Cameron of Wis.,	Howe,	Morrill,	Windom.
Christiancy,	Ingalls,	Oglesby,

NAYS—26.

Armstrong,	Eaton,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Bailey,	Eustis,	Kernan,	Thurman,
Beck,	Gordon,	Lamar,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Grover,	McCreery,	Wallace,
Coke,	Harris,	McDonald,	Withers.
Davis of W. Va.,	Hereford,	Maxey,
Dennis,	Hill,	Randolph,

ABSENT—15.

Barnum,	Conover,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Bruce,	Dorsey,	McPherson,	Spencer,
Chaffee,	Garland,	Sargent,	Whyte.
Cockrell,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,

So the bill was passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I have the floor, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to say, without the leave of my good friend from Virginia, that I favor a number of the provisions of this bill, and could one or two provisions have been changed I should have cheerfully and cordially voted for it. I simply desired to say that the vote was pressed, that other gentlemen took the time in discussing it and giving their explanations and their reasons, and I did not wish to consume the time of the Senate in making a speech upon the bill; but I intended to make an explanation before it got as far as it did and to explain why it was that I, although favoring most of the provisions of the bill, could not vote for it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation for an absent Senator that I ought to have made before.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent of the Senate to make a statement in regard to an absent Senator. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to say what I ought to have said before when the vote was being called upon the passage of the bill, that the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. CHAFFEE,] who is necessarily absent, was paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. BARNUM.] If the Senator from Colorado had been present he would have voted in favor of the passage of the bill, and the Senator from Connecticut would have voted against it.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAINE. I move that the Senate take up for consideration the resolutions which I offered relative to the exercise of the elective franchise, which can go over as the unfinished business.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Senate bill No. 300 has the precedence, and I shall insist upon its standing in the order in which it now stands, and that it be taken up on Monday morning. It will occupy but little time.

Mr. BLAINE. The consideration which I would suggest, and for the consideration of the Senator from New Hampshire, is that if the resolutions which I offered are ever to be passed it is important that they be passed before the holidays, and that it will not delay his bill seriously if he will permit that business to take precedence. I think that would be a safer and better order.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I believe that upon Senate bill No. 300 there can be no extended debate whatever, and I feel confident that on the resolutions of my friend from Maine there will be a debate. His resolutions can wait for my bill. My bill cannot wait for his resolutions.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator underrates the capacity of the Senate of the United States when he thinks there cannot be an extended debate on his measure, or on any other.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I say what I believe, Mr. President. I think that a good deal more difference of opinion has been manifested upon the resolutions which he has offered and a greater desire to discuss them than there has been manifested upon Senate bill No. 300. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BLAINE. I shall insist——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

The question being put, a division was called for, and the ayes were 37.

Mr. BLAINE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask a parliamentary question. Has the resolution from the House in relation to adjournment over the holidays been acted on?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been. It is on the table. The Secretary will call the roll on the motion to adjourn.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 35, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—35.

Armstrong,	Davis of W. Va.,	Ingalls,	Morgan,
Bailey,	Dennis,	Jones of Florida,	Randolph,
Bayard,	Eaton,	Kernan,	Ransom,
Beck,	Eustis,	Lamar,	Thurman,
Booth,	Garland,	McCreery,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Gordon,	McDonald,	Wadleigh,
Cockrell,	Harris,	McPherson,	Wallace,
Coke,	Hereford,	Maxey,	Withers.
Davis of Illinois,	Hill,	Merrimon,

NAYS—26.

Anthony,	Dawes,	Kirkwood,	Patterson,
Blaine,	Edmunds,	McMillan,	Plumb,
Burnside,	Ferry,	Matthews,	Rollins,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hamlin,	Mitchell,	Saunders,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Teller.
Christiancy,	Howe,	Oglesby,
Conkling,	Kellogg,	Paddock,

ABSENT—15.

Allison,	Conover,	Jones of Nevada,	Spencer,
Barnum,	Dorsey,	Sargent,	Whyte,
Bruce,	Grover,	Saulsbury,	Windom.
Chaffee,	Johnston,	Sharon,

So the motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 13, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

The SPEAKER. The executive council of the National Board of Trade, consisting of nine members, is now in session in this city. The Chair has been requested to ask permission of the House that they may be admitted to the floor during their sessions in this city If there be no objection the Chair will award that privilege.

There was no objection.

GOVERNMENT FUNDS IN NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. KELLEY. By order of the Committee of Ways and Means I move that the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury in response to a resolution of the House of the 4th instant, in relation to moneys of the United States deposited in national banks, be printed for the use of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KELLEY. I also, in connection with the same subject, submit the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House, at the earliest day practicable after the close of the congressional recess, whether there were any balances in coin standing to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States in any national bank on the 1st day of March, 1876, and on the first of each succeeding month to and including the 1st of January, 1879, and the names and location of the banks which held such balances and the amount held by each at the respective dates indicated.

Mr. KELLEY. To narrow the scope of the resolution I will modify it so that it will read "coin standing on funding account."

Mr. BURCHARD. How does this resolution differ from the one which the gentleman offered a few days ago, and which was replied to?

Mr. KELLEY. In this respect: the resolution of the other day inquired as to two dates, the 30th of September and the 30th of November, 1878. This resolution embraces a longer period, beginning with the 1st of March, 1876, and terminating with the coming 1st of January. I think it an inquiry legitimate for information which the House requires.

Mr. BURCHARD. Let it lie over under the rules until we can have an opportunity to see it.

Mr. KELLEY. There is no rule under which the resolution can lie over.

The SPEAKER. The effect of the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] is in the nature of an objection.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman objects to the House having this information let him say so.

Mr. BURCHARD. Let it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. KELLEY. Under the force of this objection I beg leave to withdraw the resolution, and will submit it on Monday.

The resolution was accordingly withdrawn.

LOUISA M. MANSFIELD.

Mr. WAIT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5507) for the relief of Louisa M. Mansfield, widow and executrix of General Joseph K. F. Mansfield; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON, CINCINNATI AND SAINT LOUIS RAILWAY.

Mr. SHELLEY, from the Committee on Railways and Canals, by unanimous consent, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5508) to authorize the Washington, Cincinnati, and Saint Louis Railroad Company to construct a narrow-gauge railway from tide-water to the cities of Saint Louis and Chicago; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Railways and Canals, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. KENNA. Mr. Speaker, I arise for the purpose of alluding to the sweeping statement made by the public press to the effect that all the members of the Committee of the House on Enrolled Bills except Mr. RAINEY were drunk on the last day or night of the last session. The statement, so far as it embraces me and insinuates that I was intoxicated, either at the time mentioned or at any other time during the entire session of eight months, is absolutely and unqualifiedly false. It is also untrue, so far as my knowledge extends, of the other members of that committee. I have procured statements of the Speaker and other officers of the House, and also of members on the floor most familiar with my condition and conduct on the last day and night and during the whole of the session, and these I offer as part of my remarks. They are as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., December 11, 1878.

MY DEAR SIR: Your note of yesterday, calling my attention to a statement which you say has been repeatedly made by the public press, that all the members of the Committee on Enrolled Bills except Mr. RAINEY were drunk during the last day and night of the session ending in June last, has been received, and you ask me to free you from such an accusation. I most cheerfully consent to do this, because I remember distinctly that you were on the floor and at your post all of that busy night attending untiringly to the public business. I may also take occasion to add in this connection that I have never seen you, in or out of the House, under the influence of liquor. Outrageous injustice has been done by such statements, not only to you but to the other members of the committee, and it gives me the greatest pleasure to deny them most emphatically.

Very sincerely, yours,

SAM. J. RANDALL.

Hon. JOHN E. KENNA,
House of Representatives.

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES U. S.,
Washington, D. C., December 11, 1878.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your inquiry touching the conduct of the Committee on Enrolled Bills on the night of the adjournment of the last session of Congress, I take pleasure in saying that on the night referred to I saw much of you and other members of that committee, and the statement so often repeated in the public prints to the effect that you or any other member of the committee was disqualified for the discharge of his duty is, so far as I know or believe, untrue.

I remember distinctly that between midnight and day of the night referred to you were for a considerable time engaged with me in the comparison of a number of enrolled bills, which you subsequently reported to the House, and I had no suspicion that you had even so much as tasted anything intoxicating.

I never knew of your being intoxicated even in the least degree during that entire session, and never heard any such intimation from any source until I saw in the public prints the absurd stories which have been so extensively circulated in reference to the conduct of your committee on the night referred to.

Very respectfully,

G. M. ADAMS, Clerk.

Hon. JOHN E. KENNA.

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES U. S.,
Washington, D. C., December 11, 1878.

SIR: Your esteemed favor of the 10th instant is received. In reply to your inquiry I take pleasure in stating that the charges that have appeared in public print, to the effect that you was drunk and neglected your official duties as a member of the Committee on Enrolled bills on the night of the adjournment of the second session Forty-fifth Congress, are wholly without foundation.

Very respectfully,

THEO. F. KING, Enrolling Clerk.

Hon. JOHN E. KENNA.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., December 11, 1878.

DEAR SIR: I have received your note of the 10th instant, inquiring whether I saw you on the last night of the last session of Congress, and whether I observed your condition and conduct. In reply, I met you often during the night; at one time I approached you and asked you if you could relieve Mr. RAINEY in the comparison of the sundry civil appropriation bill; you replied that you could, and went with me into the House enrolling-room and offered your services. Mr. RAINEY courteously declined them, saying that he preferred to complete the bill, and did so. You were not the least excited or under the slightest influence of liquor at any time during that night or during the session, that ever I knew or heard of.

Respectfully, yours,

J. D. C. ATKINS.

Hon. JOHN E. KENNA.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
December 11, 1878.

DEAR SIR: Yours bringing to my attention a statement alleging that you were under the influence of liquor, consequently unable to discharge duties incidental to member of Committee on Enrolled Bills on last night of the last session of Congress, is before me. I take pleasure in saying that to my own personal knowledge the aforesaid statement does you great injustice. I recollect perfectly well seeing and conversing with you on the night referred to, at a very late hour. I can therefore certify positively that you were not intoxicated then, nor at any other time so far as I am aware. You came into the committee-room that night and asked if your services were needed. At that time there was but one bill ready for comparison; that one I had in charge.

I am, very respectfully, yours, &c.,

J. H. RAINEY.

Hon. JOHN E. KENNA.

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, December 12, 1878.

DEAR SIR: I have seen it stated in one or more papers that you, on the last night of the last session were under the influence of spirituous liquors. I regretted to see such a foul slander given circulation. I saw you frequently during the last day and the last night of that session—the last time about four o'clock of that night. I am satisfied that so far from being under the influence of liquor that you had not tasted a drop. Furthermore, I saw you very often during that session, and I do not believe you tasted a drop during that long and arduous session.

Yours, truly,

FRANK HEREFORD.

Hon. JOHN E. KENNA.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., December 13, 1878.

DEAR KENNA: The story that you were intoxicated on the last night of the last session of Congress, or at any time during the session, is without foundation in fact. Boarding together as we did in the same house, and associating daily in and out of Congress, I had every opportunity to have known it if anything of the kind occurred.

Yours, most truly,

B. WILSON.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., December 12, 1878.

MY DEAR SIR: In reply to your inquiry made to-day, in regard to the charge in some of the public prints that you were intoxicated on the last night of the last session of Congress, it affords me pleasure to say that at the time named, being unable to attend the session on account of sickness, I requested you to get General KEIFER to offer a report which I had made from the Committee on War Claims in case of the Methodist Episcopal Church South at Charleston, and the record shows it was done as requested. This shows you were attending to business. I desire to add that I was with you a great deal during the session, and unhesitatingly say I never saw you in the least intoxicated to my knowledge.

Very truly, yours,

B. F. MARTIN.

Hon. JOHN E. KENNA.

DELAWARE RIVER.

Mr. WARD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5509) to improve the navigation of the Delaware River by providing additional and adequate lights thereon between Cherry Island Flats and the city of Philadelphia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF PENSION LAWS.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to ask that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5339) to amend the pension laws, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

NATIONAL RAILWAY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CALKINS (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5510) to organize the National Railway of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I ask consent that House bill No. 5231, making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense and for the armament thereof for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, returned from the Senate with amendments, be taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and the amendments of the Senate printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

GEORGE W. CLARK.

Mr. CRAVENS. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table Senate bill 1038, for the relief of Jesse Turner and others, sureties upon the official bond of George W. Clark, formerly Indian agent, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There was no objection; and accordingly the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

DEBT OF ARKANSAS TO THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CRAVENS. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means Senate bill No. 116, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust and settle the debt due the United States by the State of Arkansas.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS AND SEAMEN OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have passed at the present time a joint resolution construing an act of Congress granting pensions to soldiers and seamen of the war of 1812. I desire to have read in connection with this resolution, for the information of the House, a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, on hearing which I think every gentleman here will concur in the propriety of passing the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will first be read, after which there will be opportunity for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas, anticipating war with Great Britain, the Government of the United States received into its military and naval service persons who were discharged from such service less than fourteen days subsequent to June 18, 1812, the date of the formal declaration of war; and

Whereas, owing to the imperfect means of communication which existed at the date of the President's proclamation that peace had been established (February 18, 1815) between the United States and Great Britain, many persons who were received into the military and naval service of the United States to serve in the war of 1812 were retained in such service a considerable time after the establishment of peace: Now,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in the settlement of claims for pension and bounty lands on account of service in the war of 1812 the Commissioner of Pensions shall compute all the time the soldier served between June 1, 1812, and March 1, 1815.

Mr. WILSON. I ask that a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions be now read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the introduction of this joint resolution?

Mr. BREWER. Let the right to object be reserved until the letter is read.

The SPEAKER. The letter will be read, after which there will be opportunity to object.

The Clerk read as follows:

PENSION OFFICE, December 10, 1878.

DEAR SIR: Herewith please find draft of a joint resolution. Note that provision is made for service outside of the period of war, both at the beginning and the close of the war, and also for claims for bounty land.

The number of claimants who will be benefited is small, and it seems to me that if any relief of this sort is to be had it should cover the whole case; but you will be the better judge of what should be done.

Very respectfully, yours,

J. W. BENTLEY.

Hon. BENJAMIN WILSON,
House of Representatives.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the House will let this resolution pass at once.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of an objection, and would prevent the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the resolution may be printed for the information of the House, for I am sure no member, if he understands it, will object to it.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable. Does the gentleman desire to have the resolution referred?

Mr. WILSON. No, sir, I do not. If it is referred it may never come back again. I hope it will be printed for the information of the House, as I shall offer it again on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Having been read, the resolution will appear in the RECORD.

REPORT OF HEALTH OFFICER, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SINGLETON, from the Committee on Printing, reported back, without amendment, the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Public Printer be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to print 1,500 extra copies of the report of the health officer of the District of Columbia for use of said health officer.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROFESSOR HAYDEN'S SURVEY OF THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. SINGLETON also, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed 10,000 copies of Professor Hayden's twelfth annual report of the Geological and Geographical Survey of the Territories for 1878; 5,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the Department of the Interior, and 1,000 copies for the use of the office of the survey,

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON also, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring.) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 3,000 copies each of volumes 3, 8, and 13 of the final reports of the Geological and Geographical Survey of the Territories in quarto form, with the necessary illustrations; 1,500 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 500 copies for the use of the Senate, 500 copies for the use of the survey, and 500 copies for the use of the Department of the Interior; the illustrations to be made by the Public Printer, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. M. J. DONAHOE.

Mr. FORNEY. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee of Claims Senate bill No. 1228, for the relief of Mrs. M. J. Donahoe.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

R. W. CORBIN.

Mr. DIBRELL. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 1173, for the relief of R. W. Corbin, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee of Claims.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

WILLIAM H. MORGAN—MICHAEL O'BRIEN.

Mr. RYAN. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 1405, for the relief of William H. Morgan, and Senate bill No. 658, to authorize the restoration of Michael O'Brien to the rank of first lieutenant in the Army, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the bills were respectively taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Millitary Affairs, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

O. D. LEMERT.

Mr. RYAN also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5511) for the relief of O. D. Lemert, late captain First Regiment Mississippi Volunteer Infantry, African descent; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CONVEYANCE BY GUARDIANS, KANSAS.

Mr. FENN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 3512) to confirm certain conveyances executed by guardians appointed by the courts of the Territory and State of Kansas; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

A. D. FISHER.

Mr. FENN also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 1187) for the relief of A. D. Fisher, Washington Territory; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. I move, by unanimous consent, Mr.

Speaker, to take from the Speaker's table for reference Senate bill No. 2.

Mr. KNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move to go to the business upon the Speaker's table for the purpose of taking up the various bills there for reference to appropriate committees, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

Mr. DUNNELL. Are they to be subject to objection?

The SPEAKER. Objection to reference will of course have the effect to leave the bill upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. DUNNELL. Then I do not object to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

REFERENCE OF BUSINESS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table, and it was taken up and disposed of as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 1962) for the relief of Jane Clark, Margaret A. Jack, Christine Anderson, and Mary Johnson—returned from the Senate, with amendments.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to ask to have that bill taken up and the amendments of the Senate concurred in?

The SPEAKER. Not under the order by which the House went to the Speaker's table. That order was that bills should only be taken up for reference, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider. If the gentleman objects to the reference of the bill then it will remain upon the Speaker's table. It will not lose any of its rights.

Mr. OLIVER. I do object.

The SPEAKER. The bill then remains upon the Speaker's table.

A bill (H. R. No. 3828) to amend section 23 of the act approved June 22, 1874, entitled "An act to amend customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties," returned from the Senate with amendments—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

A bill (H. R. No. 805) to repeal all that part of the act approved January 14, 1875, known as the resumption act, which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of United States bonds and redeem and cancel the greenback currency, returned from the Senate with amendments.

Mr. BUCKNER. I wish to state that I have been instructed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to move the reference of that bill to that committee.

The SPEAKER. It is under the restriction that it is not to come back on a motion to reconsider.

Mr. BUCKNER. That, I believe, is the order under which the House is acting.

Mr. HANNA. I object.

The SPEAKER. The bill then remains upon the Speaker's table.

A bill (H. R. No. 5052) to amend section 3835 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, returned from the Senate with amendments—of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

A resolution (H. R. No. 162) for the relief of Bushrod B. Taylor, returned from the Senate with amendments—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 490) to authorize the appointment of commissioners to determine claims, and for other purposes, at Hot Springs, in the State of Arkansas—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. No. 238) extending the time for the construction and completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad.

Mr. DUNNELL. I object to the reference of that bill. Let it lie upon the table.

A bill (S. No. 337) for the relief of Thomas H. Halsey, paymaster United States Army—to the Committee of Claims.

A bill (S. No. 753) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico—to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

A bill (S. No. 989) for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, and to provide for the repayment of certain fees and commissions paid on void entries of public lands—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. No. 532) to incorporate the Suburban Railway Company of Washington, in the District of Columbia—to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

A bill (S. No. 1114) to amend the one hundred and third article of war—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 796) for the relief of John Henderson—to the Committee of Claims.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 5307) to correct an error of enrollment in bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

E. B. LIEBERG.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5512) for the relief of E. B. Lieberg; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES COMMISSIONER JOHN I. DAVENPORT.

Mr. WOOD. I now call up the question of privilege which was raised on the resolution I submitted yesterday, so that it may be disposed of at this time if the Speaker is now ready to make his decision.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that at the election held in the city of New York on the 5th day of November, 1878, United States Commissioner John I. Davenport, acting as chief supervisor of elections in the second judicial district of New York, was guilty of illegal, unjust, and oppressive exercise of pretended authority in causing the arrest and imprisonment of citizens innocent of offense, by which he deprived them of their rights to vote and subjected them to indignities, insults, and intimidation without warrant of law or justification, which arrests have since been declared illegal in a test case by a judge of the circuit court of the United States; and

Whereas if these allegations are true the said Davenport should be forthwith removed and punished: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to proceed without delay to an investigation of the conduct of said Davenport at the time aforesaid, with power to sit in the city of New York by subcommittee or otherwise, and that said subcommittee shall have all the authority of the whole committee for said purpose, with power to administer oaths, to send for persons and papers, to sit during the sessions of the House, and to report at any time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I raised the question yesterday whether this was a question of privilege. To the inquiry of the Speaker, independent of that question, as to whether Mr. Davenport was an officer impeachable under the Constitution, I replied that I doubted if he was an impeachable officer. After a little more reflection upon the subject I am now disposed to think that officer is impeachable under the Constitution. The Constitution says that civil officers are liable to impeachment. Incidentally, it defines civil officers by saying that the President shall appoint all officers except such inferior officers as Congress may empower the heads of Departments and courts to appoint. I suppose this officer will come in under that second designation. As a matter of practice, I believe there never has been a decision by any of our impeaching courts as to whether the power of impeachment includes in its jurisdiction all these minor officers. That, however, is not important in this matter. As I said before, I am inclined to believe that this officer does come within the purview of impeachment.

As to the question of privilege, which I think is independent of that, I do not propose to make any opposition to the pending resolution on that score. I do not think this resolution is a question of privilege, for it does not propose impeachment. But I waive that, being willing and desirous that the fullest investigation shall be had. For the present I propose to leave it to gentlemen on the other side to say whether they are willing to move in this case only against wrong-doers to their own people. I will add that the point I made yesterday, that we cannot without unanimous consent authorize a committee to report at any time, was well taken. I do not propose, however, to press this point, and will withdraw it.

I am willing that this resolution shall now be considered. I wish to offer two amendments in order to perfect the resolution and enlarge the scope of the investigation: to insert the word "official" before "conduct," so that only his official conduct shall be investigated, which I suppose is what the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] means to get at. Then I desire to strike out the words "at the time aforesaid," which means the time of election, and insert in lieu thereof the words "during said election and the registration which preceded it." I think the investigation ought to extend to the days of registration also, to cover the whole time of registration and election, and of the facts connected therewith.

Mr. WOOD. I accept the amendments.

Mr. MILLS. How does this resolution come before the House? As a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] rose in his place yesterday and stated that he submitted the resolution as a question of privilege.

Mr. MILLS. Then the question is on the right of that gentleman to submit the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It is not; the question is on the adoption of the resolution as modified.

Mr. MILLS. What I desire to inquire is, how does the gentleman from New York obtain the floor in order to bring the House to a vote on the resolution?

The SPEAKER. Because he said that he rose to a question of privilege, and that statement is not disputed.

Mr. MILLS. I am asking for information how this question came before the House?

The SPEAKER. It came over from yesterday by agreement.

Mr. McCOOK. I would like to occupy a moment or two.

Mr. WOOD. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. McCOOK. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to say as the only Representative of the republican party on this floor from the city of New York, and as one of its candidates at the late election, that I hope no gentleman on this side will offer the slightest objection to the passage of any resolution proposing to inquire into the free exercise of the suffrage by the citizens of that city. I have old-fashioned notions in regard to this question of suffrage, and I am as much opposed to illegal interference with the voter in the city of New York as to illegal interference with the voter in the States of Louisiana or South Carolina. If men have been intimidated in New York, it is as criminal and as wicked as "bull-dozing" in Louisiana or ballot-box stuffing in South Carolina. Therefore, sir, speaking for myself alone, I desire that this resolution should be adopted.

If I had time I think I could give reasons why my distinguished colleague, the leader of the democratic party on this floor, is so exceedingly anxious for an investigation in this case. I am ignorant of any illegal interference with the right of the citizens of New York to vote at the last election day, and I have never heard from any member of the democratic party entitled to any especial degree of confidence and respect, with the exception of my colleague here, any statement that the republican voters of that city, constituting about one-third of the 130,000 or 140,000 voters there, succeeded in effectually "bull-dozing" the democrats of that great city, composing about two-thirds of the voting population.

I think I could show from figures I have before me that in the ninth congressional district of New York, for instance, the district now represented by my distinguished colleague, although in 1874 he carried his district by 2,335 majority and in 1876 by over 6,000, he was at the late election in a minority to the tune of 5,262 votes. In that district Bradley, democratic candidate for judge of court of appeals, received 14,565 votes, while WOOD, Tammany candidate for Congress, received but 7,277 votes to 6,480 for Hardy, independent democrat, and 5,726 for Berryman, republican.

Mr. Speaker, it was not perhaps the fault of the democratic party that this extraordinary condition of things occurred in the city of New York. There is over there a "wheel within a wheel." There is a difference between the democracy and "Tammany;" and whenever we have united with the anti-Tammany element the extraordinary result which the gentleman now complains of has always occurred, and I hope and believe will always occur. I repeat the expression of the hope that no man—certainly no member on this side of the House—will object to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. WOOD. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution as modified was adopted.

Mr. WOOD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REVISION OF THE RULES.

Mr. MILLS. I rise to a question of privilege, and submit the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five members of the House be appointed by the Speaker, and of which he shall be chairman, to revise and simplify the rules of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MILLS. I will state in a word my reason for offering this resolution. It is known to the House that various amendments to the rules which have been introduced have been referred to the Committee on the Rules. We have been repeatedly informed that the committee has attempted a revision of all the rules, but for some cause or other the committee has never been able to hold meetings frequently enough to perform the labor necessarily connected with this revision. At present, the venerable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] is unable to attend the meetings of the committee, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] is not present. I hope, therefore, that the Speaker of the House will be permitted to appoint a committee to revise and simplify our rules, so that this business may be effectively discharged.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that this resolution had better be referred to the Committee on Rules, which has leave to report at any time.

Mr. MILLS. I am fearful that we cannot get a report, because the Speaker, as chairman of that committee, will not be able to get the committee together.

Mr. BURCHARD. I submit that under the rules any proposition for a change of the rules must lie over for one day.

Mr. MILLS. It is the constitutional privilege of a House of Representatives to adopt rules at any time; it is a continuing power of which the House cannot divest itself.

Mr. EDEN. I ask whether this is a question of privilege?

Mr. BURCHARD. Does not this question under the rules necessarily go to the Committee on Rules?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has suggested that reference.

Mr. EDEN. I have no objection to the reference of the resolution; but I object to its being entertained now as a question of privilege.

Mr. MILLS. The House has at all times the power to determine what its rules shall be. In this respect it is superior to any rules which may exist at any particular time.

The SPEAKER. The House, acting in pursuance of its constitutional power, has adopted certain limitations as to changes of its rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Texas would carry the power of the House in this respect further than the Constitution justifies. It empowers each House to make rules; and one of the rules which this House has made prescribes how the rules shall be amended.

Mr. MILLS. But the gentleman from Ohio is too good a lawyer to say that this power when once exercised is exhausted. It is what may be denominated a continuing power. Would the gentleman contend that this House can bind itself by rules which it has no power to revoke?

Mr. GARFIELD. If the position of the gentleman were correct, a member could at any time interrupt our proceedings by bringing in a proposition for the amendment of the rules.

Mr. MILLS. But my resolution is offered when there is no other business before the House.

The SPEAKER. The resolution can come in by consent and be referred to the Committee on Rules, which has power to report at any time. Does the gentleman from Texas ask the reference of the resolution to that committee, which the Chair thinks will accomplish the object contemplated?

Mr. MILLS. No, sir; the reference would be utterly useless.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not before the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour begins at thirty minutes after one o'clock. This being Friday, the committees will be called for reports of a private nature. The call rests with the Committee of Claims.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. BRIGHT, from the Committee of Claims, that committee was discharged from the further consideration of the following cases; and the same were referred to the Committee on War Claims:

A bill (H. R. No. 4405) for the relief of Samuel B. Bird, of Louisiana;

A bill (H. R. No. 4356) for the relief of Louden Mullen;

A bill (H. R. No. 4502) for the relief of A. B. Templeton;

A bill (H. R. No. 4501) for the relief of A. M. Maynard;

A bill (H. R. No. 4500) for the relief of Nathaniel Fitch;

A bill (H. R. No. 4499) for the relief of W. W. Warner;

A bill (H. R. No. 4496) for the relief of John S. Spangenburg;

A bill (H. R. No. 4446) for the relief of Henry Hull, of Pattersonville, Louisiana;

A bill (H. R. No. 4498) for the relief of Stephen S. Welch;

A bill (H. R. No. 4497) for the relief of Ziba Stephens;

Petition of Henry Rehder, for relief;

Petition of John H. Wooley, of La Grange, Tennessee, for property taken by the Army of the United States to the amount of $2,785;

Petition of Mrs. Martha C. Cole, of Germantown, Shelby County, Tennessee, for property taken by the Army during the war to the amount of $1,612.50;

Petition of George W. Beasley, of La Grange, Fayette County, Tennessee, for property taken by the Army during the war to the amount of $1,102;

Petition of Rosanna H. Black, of Hardeman County, Tennessee, for property taken by the United States Army during the war to the amount of $552.50;

Petition of Lewellen Rhodes, of Germantown, Shelby County, Tennessee, for property taken by the Army during the war to the amount of $438.75;

Petition of William R. Kearney, of Bolivar, Hardeman County, Tennessee, for property taken by the Army during the war to the amount of $1,000; and Petition of John W. McClellan, Memphis, Tennessee, for compensation for commissary stores taken by the United States Army during the late war.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of Claims has been discharged from the further consideration of these cases and they have been referred to the Committee on War Claims, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

A. D. COOK & CO.

Mr. BRIGHT. I am directed by the Committee of Claims to report back a bill (H. R. No. 1479) for the relief of A. D. Cook & Co., providing for the remission of a forfeiture and payment of a claim, without any accompanying report.

The SPEAKER. Is it an adverse report?

Mr. BRIGHT. By request, the committee proposes no action on the subject.

The SPEAKER. Then it is in the nature of an adverse report, and under the rules all adverse reports must be accompanied with a report in writing.

Mr. BRIGHT. I had better state to the Chair that by the request of the member who introduced the bill the committee took no action on the subject, as it was the claimant's desire, as we were informed, to withdraw the papers from the files of the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman accompany the report with a request for the withdrawal of the papers?

Mr. BRIGHT. I do.

The SPEAKER. That has the effect of discharging the committee.

The Committee of Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the subject; and it was laid on the table.

Then, on motion of Mr. BRIGHT, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal of the papers in the same case.

REFUND TO NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. BRIGHT also, from the Committee of Claims, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 205) to refund to the State of North Carolina certain money therein named; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. CUMMINGS subsequently asked and obtained leave to submit the views of the minority of the Committee of Claims on the above bill; and the same was ordered to be printed with the report of the majority.

MRS. MARGARET CASSIDEY.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5513) for the relief of Mrs. Margaret Cassidey; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calender, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TIPTON B. COLLINS.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, also, from the same committee, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 2707) for the relief of Tipton B. Collins, of Alabama; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JACKSON GRUBB.

Mr. DAVIS of North Carolina, also, from the same committee, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 4038) for the relief of Jackson Grubb, of McMinn County, Tennessee; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

J. B. HOLLOWAY.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I report back also from the Committee of Claims the bill (H. R. No. 3775) for the relief of J. B. Holloway. This claim has been satisfied. The claimant has been paid under an appropriation bill. I move, therefore, that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it do lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 1460) to authorize the issue of certain duplicate registered bonds for the benefit of the Manhattan Savings Institution.

The message also announced that the Senate returned the bill (S. No. 415) for the relief of Ella Long.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 5230) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

LABORERS, ETC., EMPLOYED BY THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I also report from the Committee on Claims, as a substitute for the House bill No. 746, a bill (H. R. No. 5514) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872, and for former years, and for other purposes," approved May 18, 1872. This bill, Mr. Speaker, gives relief to a large number of laborers, and I ask that it be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The substitute will be read.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Let the report also be read as well as the bill.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 2 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872, and for former years, and for other purposes," approved May 18, 1872, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to include, in the settlement therein provided for, all accounts for the services of laborers, workmen and mechanics, employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States between the 19th day of May, 1869, and the date when full payments were commenced for eight hours' labor without reduction on account of the reduction of the hours of labor, by the act approved on the 18th day of May, 1868, when it shall be made to appear that the reduction of the hours of labor was the sole cause of the reduction of wages.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this act shall extend to watchmen and ship-keepers, and the proper accounting officer of the Treasury shall be authorized and required to settle the accounts of all watchmen and ship-keepers employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States, whose wages were reduced on account of working but eight hours, or who were required to work more than eight hours per day without increased pay, at any time since the passage of the act of June 25, 1868, constituting eight hours a day's work, and allow them pay at the per diem rate for the additional number of hours they may have been required to labor, until such time as they may have been so paid: Provided, it shall be made to appear that the reduction of the hours of labor was the sole cause of the reduction of wages, and provided further that the additional number of hours for which extra compensation shall be allowed shall not exceed two hours per day.

A sufficient sum is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to meet the provisions of this act.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to inquire of the Chair if this bill is in order under the call for private bills?

Mr. COX, of New York. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not make any point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this is a private bill. It is for the benefit of private individuals.

The bill (H. R. No. 5514) was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. It is not sought to place the bill on its passage at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Why should it not go to the Calendar?

The SPEAKER. Because the committee have the right to report the bill for consideration, and the point was not made that it should go to the Calendar.

Mr. COX, of New York. I hope the gentleman will not insist on the point of order. It is a bill for the benefit of laborers.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. It may be for the benefit of laborers, but I think it should go to the Calendar like other bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman should have made his point sooner.

Mr. BURCHARD. My colleague made the point as soon as he learned that it was proposed to put the bill on its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point should have been made sooner, but if the gentleman from Illinois insists upon it the Chair will recognize him. The point of order should have been made immediately after the bill was read through. The Chair stated that the bill had been read a first and second time and that the question was on the engrossment and third reading. After that announcement the Chair thinks that, strictly speaking, the point was made too late.

Mr. EDEN. The gentleman from North Carolina said when he reported the bill that he desired to have the bill read and also the report accompanying it.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have no objection to hearing the report read.

The SPEAKER. If the object of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] in not making the point of order at once was to see whether it rested against the bill or not, the Chair will see that he is protected and will recognize him to make the point of order.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. That was my object.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I wish to state that this bill was before us in the last Congress, and that it was reported favorably from the Committee of Claims by Mr. Cason. The present bill follows the facts as embraced in the report then made. I think if gentlemen will listen to the report they will be satisfied that the bill should pass.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

Mr. COX, of New York. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois states that his object was, before he lost his right to make the point of order, to see whether it rested against the bill. It is never the practice of the Chair to take any advantage of gentlemen who may have been tardy in objecting on account of a misapprehension.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman should have been more vigilant

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872, and for former years, and for other purposes," approved May 18, 1872, (H. R. 746,) have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

A bill similar to that now under consideration was before the Forty-fourth Congress and referred to the Committee of Claims. That committee made the following report, which sets forth the facts:

"The Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1005) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872, and for former years, and for other purposes," approved May 18, 1872, beg leave to submit the following report:

"The Congress of the United States, on the 25th day of June, 1868, enacted that eight hours should constitute a day's labor for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States. This law was not regarded by officers in charge of the employment of laborers, workmen, and mechanics for Government service in many parts of the United States. This was especially true in the Military Department of the Missouri, and many of the laborers, workmen, and mechanics in the Government employ were required either to work ten hours for a day's labor or be reduced one-fifth of the sum paid for each day's work, and in this manner the Government officers evaded carrying out the provisions of the eight-hour law. Your committee beg leave to refer to one or two military orders in the Department of the Missouri directing the pay and hours of labor by Government employés.

"On the 24th of February, 1869, the depot-quartermaster at Fort Leavenworth issued a circular to his employés, to set at rest all speculation as to his interpretation of the law, in which he announces that the places of labor shall, after March 1, be open ten hours each day, and those choosing to work that time should receive the pay fixed in General Order No. 6, but those choosing to work the legal day's work of eight hours should have their pay reduced one-fifth; and this order was carried out.

"On the 24th of March, 1869, the commanding general of the Department of the Missouri issues General Order No. 3, establishing the rates of pay under his interpretation of the law and reducing the same one-fifth from that of General Order No. 6, thus sustaining the circular issued a month earlier by the depot-quartermaster; and to leave no doubt that the intention was to reduce the pay because of the reduction of the hours of labor, issues, on the 26th of the same month, and just two days later, General Order No. 4, requiring all workshops and places of labor to be kept open ten hours each day on and after April 1, 1869, and allowing all employés who choose to work the ten hours the same pay as in General Order No. 6, and calling it two hours overtime, at the rate of pay for those who worked eight hours. It will be observed that the commanding general first reduces the wages for eight hours' labor one-fifth, and next gives those an opportunity to retain the old wages by working the ten hours, proving that no reduction of pay would have been made and ordered but for the reduction of the hours of labor.

"On the 19th day of May, 1869, the President of the United States issued his proclamation that no reductions should be made in the wages because of the reduction of the hours of labor. This did not settle the difficulty, for the proclamation as well as the law was disregarded. On the 11th day of May, 1872, the President issued his second proclamation, commanding all officers of the executive department of the Government to obey the law, and stated that this second proclamation was issued because the first had not been obeyed.

"Congress on the 18th day of May, 1872, passed the law paying all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by the Government between June 25, 1868, and May 19, 1869, who were required to work at reduced rates of pay, whether the reduction was caused by lessening the allowance of pay per day when working eight hours or continuing to work ten hours without increase of pay; which act the present bill proposes amending so as to pay the same class of Government employés as those named in the original bill, and mentioned in the President's two proclamations, to the time when the Government commenced paying full wages for eight hours' work per day, which began about the 1st day of October, 1872.

"The law above mentioned undoubtedly passed Congress under the impression that the President's first proclamation would be obeyed by the officers having charge of Government employés; but the proclamation having been disregarded, and the President having issued a second one commanding that the law should be obeyed and that eight hours should be a day's labor in Government work, it is but justice that the law should be amended so as to cover the full time in which the law was disregarded and until it was complied with after the President's second proclamation. To do otherwise would be to pay those men forced to work ten hours per day the same as others who only worked eight hours per day. To make such discrimination would, in the opinion of your committee, be unjust, and should be obviated by the passage of the accompanying bill.

"It was not until the 11th day of September, 1872, just four months after the second proclamation of the President, before the commanding general of the Department of the Missouri issued General Order No. 19, revoking General Orders Nos. 3 and 4 of 1869, and re-established the pay for labor at eight hours per day.

"It is stated by Mr. J. M. Brodhead, Second Comptroller of the Treasury, in a letter to Hon. William W. Belknap, then Secretary of War, that 'the act of 1872 applies to all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by the Government between June 25, 1868, and May 19, 1869, at reduced rates of pay, whether the reduction was caused by lessening the allowance of pay per day when working eight hours or by continuing to work ten hours without increase of pay. At the request of this office I understand that the Quartermaster-General has directed the proper officers of his Department to prepare rolls embracing the names of such laborers, workmen, and mechanics as are entitled to the benefits of this act, giving all data necessary to a proper settlement of their claims.'

"On the 10th day of February, 1874, the Secretary of War, impressed with the justice of these claims, called the attention of Congress to the matter and suggested the bill now under consideration as an act of justice to these claimants and as a matter of good faith on the part of the Government. There is an important reason why Congress should pass the accompanying bill, which is shown in a letter addressed by the Quartermaster-General to the Second Comptroller of the Treasury on the 28th day of September, 1872. He says, among other things: 'It is believed that many hired mechanics and workmen of the Quartermaster Department at remote points are entitled to recover additional pay under the second section of the law of May 18, 1872. It is important to save these persons, many of them being poor and illiterate, from the necessity of paying large fees to agents,' &c.

"In answer to the above letter the Second Comptroller stated:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
"SECOND COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE,
"October 2, 1872.

"Respectfully returned to the Quartermaster-General with the recommendation that the same system be followed as has been adopted in paying employés of the Navy Department in accordance with the provisions of section 2, act May 18, 1872: that the disbursing officers of the Quartermaster Department stationed at the several military posts be caused to make out pay-rolls, showing the amounts that have been paid the employés of the War Department for services rendered, and also the balance in each case that is still due, under the stipulations of section 2, act May 18, 1872, and the proclamation of the President of May 19, 1869; said rolls, when completed, to be forwarded to the accounting officers of the Treasury, through the Quartermaster-General of the Army, for comparison and modification with the payments already made to said employés as appearing on the pay-rolls of sundry disbursing officers of the Army on file in the Treasury Department; and after said comparison has been made and certified to by the Second Comptroller and Third Auditor of the Treasury, the rolls to be returned to the proper disbursing officers of the Quartermaster Department for payment, and when payment has been made, said pay-rolls to be filed in the Treasury Department for future reference.

"J. M. BRODHEAD, Comptroller.

"This brings us to the probable amount of money involved in the passage of this bill. The rolls of these claiming employés are on file in the office of the Third Auditor, and that officer, in answer to a request of Senator Harvey, of Kansas, did, on the 25th day of February, 1875, officially inform him that it would require about $300,000 to settle all the claims, from the best data his office afforded, and that but $22,063.75 had been paid out up to that date for settlements under the existing law to May 19, 1869.

"Law and equity are on the side of this bill and the claimants it proposes relieving. Their position is sustained by the Quartermaster-General of the Army, is indorsed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, and payment recommended by the Secretary of War, all of whom have examined carefully into the matter.

"The parties seeking relief through and by this bill are laborers, workmen, and mechanics, and, through the interposition of the Quartermaster-General and the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, a system of payment has been established so as to save them from employing attorneys and claim agents to collect the little due them, and they will be paid on rolls by the various quartermasters at their respective stations."

It appears that by the construction placed upon the act of 1872, known as the "eight-hour act," watchmen and ship-keepers were not included under any one of the classes named in the act. While these employés may not be embraced within the letter of the law, we think they come within its spirit and should be included.

Under the former system ten hours were regarded as a day's work; by contract some employés worked more than ten hours. It is to be presumed that they received higher wages for laboring longer than ten hours; any additional rate of compensation, therefore, should not extend beyond two additional hours. We report back the bill amended, so as to conform to the views set forth.

Mr. CONGER. This seems to be a public bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is for the benefit of individuals.

Mr. COX, of New York. I think that point comes too late.

The SPEAKER. That objection was made some time since and in time, and the Chair decided that this was a private bill. The Chair will reverse his decision if he is shown that it was wrong.

Mr. CONGER. The original law to which this is an amendment was a general law regulating the wages of employés of the Government.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. After hearing the report of the committee read, I will withdraw my point of order that this bill should go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to the consideration of this bill at this time, but it seems to me to be evidently a public bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read from the Digest what is stated upon the subject of private bills.

The Clerk read as follows:

The line of distinction between public and private bills is so difficult to be defined in many cases that it must rest on the opinion of the Speaker and the details of the bill. It has been the practice in Parliament, and also in Congress, to consider as private such as are "for the interest of individuals, public companies or corporations, a parish, city, or county, or other locality." To be a private bill, it must not be general in its enactments, but for the particular interest or benefit of a person or persons.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that, giving a common-sense interpretation to the statement which has just been read, this bill is for the benefit of individuals.

Mr. CONGER. I have no doubt it comes within the discretion of the Chair. My impression is, that the original law of which this is an amendment was a public law, regulating the wages of all the employés of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is correct in his statement that this is an amendment to a general law. But the general law may provide the manner in which individuals shall receive relief; and that is the condition in which this bill is.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARLES E. FAHNESTOCK.

Mr. CUMMINGS, from the Committee of Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 1244) for the relief of Charles E. Fahnestock; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

M. S. DRAUGHN.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I am directed by the same committee to report back with a favorable recommendation Senate bill No. 471, for the relief of M. S. Draughn. I am requested by the gentleman who is most particularly interested in this bill in the House to ask for its present consideration. It is a matter involving but fifty or sixty dollars, and I do not think there will be any objection to it.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Is this bill subject to a point of order?

Mr. CUMMINGS. It is subject to a point of order if the gentleman thinks proper to make it.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, and then the Chair will determine the point of order.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to M. S. Draughn, of the State of Tennessee, the sum of $60 in full for property rented from him and occupied under contract, and for which rent vouchers, now on file in the Treasury Department, were given.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I make the point of order that this bill must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

E. ROUFF.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I am also directed by the same committee to report back with a favorable consideration Senate bill No. 1031, for the relief of the estate of E. Rouff. I have been instructed by the committee to ask for the present consideration of the bill. It is liable to the same point of order which was made upon the bill which I last reported.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ELLSWORTH] to make the same point upon this bill.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS OF CITIZENS OF KANSAS.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I am also directed by the committee to report a bill, as a substitute for House bill No. 1179, authorizing the appointment of a commissioner and the settlement of the claims of certain citizens of Kansas named therein. The gentleman from Kansas on my left, [Mr. HASKELL,] who introduced the bill, desires me to ask for its present consideration.

Mr. BREWER. I will reserve all points of order upon the bill until it is read.

The bill (H. R. No. 5515) authorizing the settlement of the claims of certain citizens of Kansas named therein, was then read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read at length.

Mr. BRIGHT. I ask leave to file a minority report upon this bill. I have not yet had an opportunity to prepare it, and for that reason among others I will ask that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will construe the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] as raising a point of order upon the bill.

Mr. EDEN. I will make the point of order.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I do not think it is subject to a point of order. It does not make any appropriation; it merely refers this matter to the Court of Claims for adjudication.

Mr. BRIGHT. It makes no direct appropriation, but it involves a possible appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was then read at length.

Mr. CONGER. Is not that bill subject to a point of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks a point of order would lie against the bill.

Mr. HASKELL. This is a measure introduced into this House by myself, and which has been considered by the Committee of Claims. It is a very simple bill and will do injury to nobody. It proposes merely to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction over some cases of loss in my State, but if it is to provoke long discussion and consume the morning hour I am entirely willing that it be consigned to the Private Calendar, though I had hoped to secure an expression from this House on its merits at this time.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. THOMPSON.

Mr. WARNER, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 960) for the relief of William H. Thompson, late collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of North Carolina; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HENRY B. BROWN.

Mr. WARNER, from the same Committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1971) for the relief of Henry B. Brown; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM L. ADAMS.

Mr. WARNER, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 997) for the relief of William L. Adams; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

EDWIN ROGERS.

Mr. WARNER, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (S. No. 83) for the relief of Edwin Rogers, and moved that the same be laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that this bill go the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. That is the gentleman's right. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, with an adverse recommendation, and the report will be printed.

HARLOW J. PHELPS.

Mr. WARNER also, from the Committee of Claims, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 604, a bill (H. R. No. 5516) for the relief of Harlow J. Phelps; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHARLES S. WILDER.

Mr. WARNER. I am directed by the same committee to report back, as a substitute for House bill No. 1178, a bill (H. R. No. 5517) for the relief of Charles S. Wilder, and to ask that it be now put on its passage.

The substitute was read.

Mr. EDEN. I make the point of order that this bill must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WARNER. Very well: I do not object to that reference.

The bill was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

OLIVER MOSES.

Mr. LINDSEY, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2521) for the relief of Oliver Moses, of Bath, Maine, owner of the ship James A. Wright; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

OWNERS OF THE BRIG OLIVE FRANCES.

Mr. LINDSEY also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 2517, a bill (H. R. No. 5518) for the relief of the owners of the brig Olive Frances; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

GEORGE C. JENKS.

Mr. LINDSEY also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 4395, a bill (H. R. No. 5519) for the relief of George C. Jenks, of New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SYDNEY F. OVIATT.

Mr. LINDSEY also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 46) for the relief of Sydney F. Oviatt, postmaster at Orange, Connecticut; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed.

ROBERT C. NARRAMORE.

Mr. LINDSEY also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 690, a bill (H. R. No. 5520) for the relief of Robert C. Narramore, late postmaster at Derby, Connecticut; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

VAN B. BOWERS.

Mr. LINDSEY also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5521) for the relief of Van B. Bowers, postmaster at Bucklin, Missouri; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ANN B. HUBBARD.

Mr. LINDSEY also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5522) for the relief of Ann B. Hubbard as administratrix of the estate of Edward Hubbard; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

AUGUSTUS B. GOODALE.

Mr. LINDSEY also, from the same committee, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 2503) for the relief of Augustus B. Goodale, postmaster at Port Jervis, New York; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DE FOREST W. CARPENTER.

Mr. LINDSEY also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5523) for the relief of De Forest W. Carpenter, postmaster at Richford, Vermont; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MASONIC HALL COMPANY, ATLANTA, GEORGIA.

Mr. LINDSEY also, from the same committee, reported back favorably the bill (S. No. 426) for the relief of the Masonic Hall Company of Atlanta, Georgia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT METROPOLITAN POLICE FORCE.

Mr. LINDSEY also, from the same committee, reported back favorably the bill (S. No. 319) for the relief of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GENERAL GEORGE MAXWELL.

On motion of Mr. ELLSWORTH, from the Committee of Claims, that committee was discharged from the further consideration of the papers in the case of General George Maxwell, late marshal of the Territory of Utah, and the same were laid upon the table.

On motion of Mr. ELLSWORTH, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the same case.

EMANUEL MASON.

Mr. ELLSWORTH also, from the Committee of Claims, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 3626) for the relief of Emanuel Mason, of the District of Columbia; which was laid upon the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ANDREW BURGESS AND OTHERS.

Mr. ELLSWORTH also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5524) for the relief of Andrew Burgess, John Hall, and William T. Roundtree, of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH L. STEVENS.

Mr. ELLSWORTH also, from the same committee, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 3586) for the relief of Joseph L. Stevens, postmaster at Manchester, New Hampshire; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM T. LEAGUE.

Mr. ELLSWORTH also, from the same committee, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 3528) for the relief of William T. League, of Franklin County, Tennessee; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL A. LOWE.

Mr. ELLSWORTH also, from the same committee, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 2988) for the relief of Samuel A. Lowe; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. MARY O'LOUGHLIN.

Mr. ELLSWORTH also, from the same committee, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 2499) for the relief of Mrs. Mary O'Loughlin; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MILTON B. DUFFIELD.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I am instructed by the Committee of Claims to ask that the petition of Milton B. Duffield, late marshal of the United States for the Territory of Arizona, which was reported adversely on April 4, 1878, and laid on the table, be taken from the table and again referred to the committee.

The SPEAKER. The petition is now on the files, having been laid on the table in the last session. The Chair will ask unanimous consent to have it taken from the table of the House and recommitted to the Committee of Claims.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the Chair announces that the morning hour has expired and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] is recognized.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Pending that motion, I rise to a privileged question. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 61, noes 74.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was not agreed to.

MANHATTAN SAVINGS INSTITUTION.

Mr. WOOD. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a bill which has just come from the Senate, and I will ask the House to consent to it. It is the bill (S. No. 1460) to authorize the issue of certain duplicate registered bonds for the benefit of the Manhattan Savings Institution. It is a bill to which there can be no possible objection, and there is a necessity for its immediate passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read for information, after which objections, if any, will be in order.

The bill was read.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. I must insist on the regular order.

Mr. WOOD. If the House will permit me to make a very brief explanation, I am certain there will be no objection to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon insists on the regular order.

Mr. WOOD. I do not understand the gentleman from Oregon to object to this bill. I know he can have no objection to it. It is a unanimous report from the Finance Committee of the Senate, and it unanimously passed the Senate. It is simply to allow the Secretary of the Treasury to record in the Treasury Department these registered bonds which have been stolen from a savings-bank and to retain duplicate bonds in trust for that institution.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. I have no objection to that bill, but I wish the House to proceed with the consideration of other bills which are now on the Calendar.

Mr. WOOD. Then I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Oregon object to the reference of the bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. No, sir.

There being no objection the bill (S. No. 1460) was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DURHAM. I move that the bill (H. R. No. 5230) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and that the Senate amendments be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

CUSTOMS-REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. ROBERTS. In my absence to-day the bill (S. No. 3828) to amend section 23 of the act approved June 22, 1874, entitled "An act to amend customs-revenue laws and to repeal moities," was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be brought back from the committee and remain on the table.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the commissioners of claims, transmitting their eighth general report; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. EDEN. I desire in connection with that communication to offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That 2,000 extra copies of the eighth general report of the commissioners of claims be printed, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Committee on War Claims and 1,000 for the use of the said commissioners.

The SPEAKER. Every resolution for printing goes to the Committee on Printing if the amount is over $500.

Mr. EDEN. I do not know what will be the cost.

Mr. CONGER. I think there will be unanimous consent to have the report printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not suppose that the cost will amount to $500, but it is the duty of the Chair to inform the House what is the rule.

There being no objection, the resolution was agreed to.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ENGINEER CORPS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers in regard to promotions in the Engineer Corps; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SALARIES OF COLLECTORS, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue relative to an additional appropriation of $75,000 for salaries and expenses of collectors, &c., for the year 1879; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

WILLIAM ENGLISH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to the application of William English for appointment as second lieutenant in the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the chairman of the joint commission for the completion of the Washington Monument, transmitting the report of Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas L. Casey, the United States engineer in charge of the construction of the monument; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania, until Friday, the 20th instant, on account of important business;

To Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey, for ten days; and

To Mr. SEXTON, for one week, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT,] that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. Pending that motion, the gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that to-day may be considered as objection day.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. I must object to that.

Mr. BRIGHT. I hope there will be no objection. If we do not have to-day for objection day, we will not have one until after the holiday recess.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. I must object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. BRIGHT, and it was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The House has resolved to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. BURCHARD, will take the chair.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. I will withdraw my objection to this being regarded as objection day.

The SPEAKER. The House is now in Committee of the Whole.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. BURCHARD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the first bill on the Calendar for consideration.

WILLIAM AND MARY COLLEGE.

The title of the first bill was a bill (H. R. No. 189) to reimburse the College of William and Mary, in Virginia, for property destroyed during the late war.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I move that bill be laid aside.

Mr. GOODE. I object to that; we want a vote on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House, as the Chair is informed, debate on this bill has been limited to two hours.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. The record does not show that that motion prevailed. There was a proposition of that kind pending, but the House adjourned before it was determined. I ask that the record may be referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will examine the record.

Mr. EDEN. I would inquire if the bill can be considered under this call, to-day being as objection day?

The CHAIRMAN. Objection days are the first and fourth Fridays.

Mr. EDEN. I understand that this was to be as objection day by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection was made to that proposition.

Mr. BRIGHT. The Chair is correct; the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] objected.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. I withdrew my objection to this being considered objection day.

Mr. FINLEY. The objection was not withdrawn. The Speaker of the House announced that the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] refused to withdraw his objection, and the House then resolved to go into Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The recollection of the present occupant of the Chair is that objection was made to the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT.] Afterward the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] rose and said that he withdrew his objection; and the Speaker replied that the House had then resolved to go into Committee of the Whole, and it was too late.

Mr. CONGER. That is the fact.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. I understood the Chair to say that the objection had been withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the statement of the present occupant of the Chair is correct as to the proceedings which took place in the House, and that the objection was not withdrawn until after the House had resolved to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GOODE. I will state to the committee that so far as the pending bill is concerned we do not desire to renew the debate upon it. It has been elaborately discussed in this House several times during the last session and during the Forty-second Congress, when it passed the House by a handsome majority. I hope it will be the pleasure of this committee now to give us a vote on the bill.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to submit some remarks upon this bill before the vote is taken upon it.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say that at the time of the former discussion upon the bill I was upon the list as it then stood to speak for an hour, and my friend from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] also had the same time assigned to him.

Mr. KEIFER. All I desire to say is that I headed the list.

Mr. CONGER. I only desire to retain my right to take part in the discussion at the proper time.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I would inquire of the Chair if I was not correct in the statement I made, that the time for debate upon this bill has not been limited?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] has the floor, and before he concludes the record will be examined.

Mr. KEIFER. Before proceeding to submit my remarks, I ask that the Clerk may read the pending bill for the information of the committee.

Mr. GOODE. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. GOODE. I want to arrive at some understanding as to the limit of debate. I had not anticipated that the discussion would be renewed at all. It is desirable that we should have some understanding——

Mr. KEIFER. If my yielding is to be counted against my time, I cannot yield.

Mr. GOODE. I ask the gentleman to yield so that we may go back into to the House and fix a limit for the debate; then he will be entitled to the floor when we come back into the committee.

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly; I have no objection to that.

Mr. GOODE. I move, then, that the committee rise for the purpose——

Mr. CONGER. I object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER,] who is entitled to the floor, yields to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE.]

Mr. KEIFER. I think I had better proceed now.

Mr. GOODE. I make the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not yield for any such purpose. I understood that the gentleman wanted to submit a proposition by common consent.

Mr. GOODE. Will the gentleman listen for one moment? I repeat the suggestion——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has withdrawn his consent to yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. KEIFER. I must decline to yield for the purpose of having the committee rise.

Mr. TUCKER. The gentleman will permit me to ask whether there is any limit to debate under the existing order of the House?

Mr. GOODE. None.

Mr. KEIFER. I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the record of the proceedings in the House when this bill was last under consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BRIGHT moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House; pending which

Mr. GOODE moved that all debate on the bill (H. R. No. 189) to reimburse the College of William and Mary in Virginia for property destroyed during the late war in the said committee close in two hours after the House next resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House; pending which

Mr. CONGER moved to amend by striking out "two" and inserting "three;" pending which

Mr. HARRY WHITE moved to amend the amendment by striking out "three" and inserting "four:" which motion was disagreed to.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. CONGER, the same was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. GOODE, and being put, it was decided in the affirmative.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the members present, were as follows: Yeas 107, nays 94, not voting 90.

So the motion to limit the debate to two hours was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. How much of that time has expired?

The CHAIRMAN. Since that action was taken the House has not again found itself in Committee of the Whole on this bill until to-day. The two hours' debate now commences; and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KEIFER. I ask that the Clerk read the pending bill.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill, but was interrupted by

Mr. TUCKER. I wish, with the consent of the gentleman from Ohio, to make a single inquiry: is the debate now limited to two hours?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. TUCKER. How is that time to be divided? Is there any agreement about the division of the time?

Mr. KEIFER. I do not know. This debate was opened by speeches occupying two hours on the other side. One hour has been occupied on our side by two gentlemen. That is all I know about the history of the debate.

Mr. TUCKER. Was there any understanding originally about how the time was to be divided?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill, as follows:

A bill to reimburse the College of William and Mary, in Virginia, for property destroyed during the late war.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the College of William and Mary, in Virginia, the sum of $65,000 out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to reimburse said college for the destruction of its buildings and other property destroyed without authority by disorderly soldiers of the United States during the late war: Provided, That no moneys be so paid except upon accounts of such destruction, and the damage caused thereby, duly verified and proven.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, the friends of this bill press it from one Congress to another with a pertinacity that challenges admiration. The many speeches made in this and former Congresses in favor of the payment of the claim of William and Mary College would make a large volume. The two eloquent appeals for the passage of this bill made at the last session of this Congress by the member from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] and the member from Massachusetts [Mr. LORING] were based chiefly upon sentiment. The same remark will apply to the speeches made in favor of similar bills in former Congresses.

As a matter of sentiment I too could vote for the bill if I did not take an entirely different view of my duty. The public funds should only be voted away upon sound principles of law, public duty or policy. I regard this as a war claim, and as such to be tested by the known and well-established rules of international law, founded long since upon principles of public policy.

I may be charged because of my opposition to this bill with keeping the fires of passion engendered by the war still blazing. I disclaim any desire or purpose of doing so. Neither hatred nor ill-will toward the South or any southern man has an abiding place in my heart. Whatever the North suffered during the war has been more than requited by the losses and suffering of the South. Whatever of blood has been shed in the cause of universal constitutional liberty and for the preservation of the Union has been more than compensated for by the grand results attained. I welcome the era of reconciliation and good feeling between all sections of the country. I hope not to be behind any man, North or South, in efforts to secure universal good feeling, harmony of sentiments and purposes, provided at all times security is given for the full, complete, and final protection of all citizens of the Republic in all sections of the country in the exercise of their rights and privileges.

This bill is such that, to vote intelligently on it, will require the facts to be carefully and plainly set forth. The bill provides for the payment to William and Mary College, in Virginia, of $65,000 "to reimburse said college for the destruction of its buildings and other property, destroyed without authority by disorderly soldiers of the United States during the late war." I dislike to oppose the bill, as it is in the interest of learning. The institution is an ancient one. It was chartered under the name of William and Mary in 1693, (fourth year of the joint reign of William and Mary,) and it is said to have had an existence as far back as 1660. It was originally founded and fostered as an aristocratic institution, in opposition to free schools and popular education. As early as 1671, Sir William Berkeley, the royal colonial governor in Virginia, a patron of this college, answered the following question from the lords commissioners of foreign plantations:

What course is taken about instructing the people within your government in the Christian religion? And what provision is there made for paying of your ministry?

Answer:

The same course that is taken in England out of towns; every man, according to his ability, instructing his children.

We have forty-eight parishes, and our ministry are well paid, and by my consent should be better, if they would pray oftener and preach less. But of all other commodities, so of this; the worst are sent us, and we had few that we could boast of since the persecution in Cromwell's tyranny drove divers worthy men hither. But I thank God there are no free schools nor printing, and I hope we shall not have these hundred years; for learning has brought disobedience and heresy and sects into the world, and printing has divulged them, and libels against the best government. God keep us from both.

This royal governor may have entertained the views, at least as applied to the common people, expressed by the poet Pope, that—

A little learning is a dangerous thing;
Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring:
These shallow draughts intoxicate the brain,
And drinking largely sobers us again.

This college, somewhat amply endowed, held its course in the heart of a State for two centuries where free schools were unknown until since the late war. It was regarded with favor in the South; was patronized by the South; propagated southern views; was hardly open to humble people, and has always excluded women from its benefits.

It is hoped that it has made some progress since the war. By the report of the Committee on Education and Labor we learn that patriotic considerations are relied on to induce Congress to vote for this bill. I quote from that report:

Every civilized nation has its hallowed spots about which its patriotic memories cluster, and whose names rise before the imagination whenever these memories are stirred.

* * * * * * * *

Under our form of government these hallowed spots are in the custody of States. But they hold them as trustees for the whole people, and the gratitude and affection which surround and hallow them are the gratitude and affection of the whole people.

* * * * * * * *

Unless this be true the American people alone among civilized nations are without any common objects of national reverence.

And further:

We doubt if any college in America or Europe can, in proportion to the whole number borne on its catalogue, show so large a list of names famous for conspicuous patriotic service.

These considerations being pressed on this House justifies me in looking more closely into the history of this college. I do this in no spirit of recrimination. That this college was the alma mater of Jefferson and Marshall and a long list of eminent statesmen, jurists, and lawyers is true. On account of its great age, and the fact that there were for a long time but few contemporaries of this college, it may truthfully be said that her graduates of distinguished men are comparatively large. Admitting the fact that "her list of names famous for conspicuous patriotic service" is large, how does the case stand when we look to the history of the college and its graduates immediately before and during the late war—the country's second baptism of blood for universal freedom in America?

It is safe to say, for the number of its students and graduates, the College of William and Mary furnished more men than any other institution of learning in the land who favored secession, rebellion, and war.

Before we vote money to this college on the ground of its patriotic services to the country we should not lose sight of the fact that it was destroyed by the inexorable events of war, brought on in part through its own teachings.

This college now appeals to the Treasury of the very Government which it, through its students and graduates, sought to destroy; to restore and rebuild its burned and blackened walls within which in later days were taught lessons which denied the fundamental principle, "that all men were created equal," and which would lead inevitably to perpetuate human slavery and to the overthrow of constitutional liberty.

Its board of visitors and its faculty were disloyal. Its teachings in later years were unpatriotic to the Union, as I shall be able to show. Its president, (B. S. Ewell,) prior to and during the war, was disloyal: and he is still its president, I believe. He left his high and honorable position as president of a college which boasted one hundred years ago of its patriotism in the cause of liberty, and took up the sword to destroy the country founded by Washington, Jefferson, the Adamses, Franklin, and their copatriots, and to establish a new nation in which human slavery would be coextensive with its boundaries. The teachings of the college led its students to indorse the constitution of the so-called Confederate States, which contained a section as follows:

No bill of attainder, or ex post facto law, or law denying or impairing the right of property in negro slaves shall be passed. (Art. 1, sec. 9.)

I shall not trace the individual history of the many confederate heroes this college gave to the late war. The history of the students and graduates of a college lead us unmistakably to know what principles and doctrines were taught therein.

As a mother who rears her child impresses indelibly upon it her character, which is not effaced during life, so a great institution of learning impresses on its young and susceptible students its true character. If this were not so, then indeed is education in vain.

'Tis education forms the common mind:
Just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined.

Let us look into the annals of this college a little. In 1874 a history of the college was published by its faculty. At that late day the desire uppermost in the minds of the members of the faculty was "to get a perfect war record of its students."

I read a note from that history:

All students who are known to have been in the confederate army have the letters C. S. A., with known rank, attached to their names. Some, many in fact, are omitted, and as it is the desire of the faculty to get a perfect war record of all students, additional information is solicited from all concerned.

To begin with the class of 1857–'58—what was "the perfect war record of its students?"

In the class of 1857–'58, the alumni were thirty-two in number; twenty-two of these went into the Confederate States army; the other ten seem to have no history worth recording.

The class of 1858–'59 consisted of thirty-nine in number, thirty-three of whom went into the Confederate States army; six have no history.

The class of 1859–'60 consisted of thirty-four in number, thirty-two of whom went into the Confederate States army, one became an Episcopal minister, and one a Methodist minister.

The class of 1860–'61 consisted of thirty-eight in number, thirty-four of whom went into the Confederate States army—four are without history. From 1861 to 1865 the college was closed because of the war.

The history of this college I believe does not record one of its students as going into the Union Army during the late war. The committee's report is more remarkable for what it does not contain than for what it does. It seems clear that on account of the patriotic services of this college we cannot safely vote to pay this large sum of money. If, then, we cannot, on the ground that we owe as a nation a bounty to this college because its graduates have been "famous for conspicuous patriotic service" vote for this bill, can we do so on any other sound principle? Is it a war claim that should be paid on any principle of law, justice, public policy, or duty? The committee find some other and minor grounds upon which it believes this claim should be paid. Let me say here, I regret that this claim was not referred to the Committee on War Claims, where it appropriately belonged. (Several times before, however, this bill has been referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.)

Under the rules of this House it no more belonged to the Committee on Education and Labor than a claim for injury in the war to a bank building to the Committee on Banking and Currency; a claim for injury by the war to a ship, to the Committee on Naval Affairs or Commerce; a claim for injury in the war to private lands, to the Committee on Private Land Claims; a claim for injury or destruction in the war to a manufacturing establishment, to the Committee on Manufactures; a claim for the taking by the Army of products of the soil, to the Committee on Agriculture; a claim for destruction of a library or a botanical garden, to the Committee on the Library, over which my friend from New York [Mr. COX] so gracefully presides.

The propriety of the reference is hardly strengthened by the fact that the author of the bill [Mr. GOODE] is chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor and is interested in the appropriation of this large sum of money, he being one of the visitors or trustees of the college. He is at least the nominal author of the report which recommends the payment to himself and other cotrustees of $65,000. The report further finds as reasons why the claim should be paid, in addition to the one that the college is a "hallowed spot about which patriotic memories cluster," that Union soldiers, "provoked by defeat and under the influence of drink, set fire to the building and prevented the residents of the neighborhood from extinguishing the flames till it was wholly consumed;" that "the Government had taken possession of the property for its own purposes, excluding the owners and preventing them from taking any measures to secure its protection;" that "by the law of nations institutions of learning are exempted by all civilized nations from the hostilities of war."

Assuming the facts to be as stated in the first two of these reasons, nothing is better settled than that there is no legal ground, in the light of the judicial precedents, for the payment of this claim.

It is not true that by the law of nations colleges are exempted from the hostilities of war, and if such were the law it does not follow that when they are destroyed by a hostile army, either with or without the direction of those in authority, there is necessarily any legal liability resting on the Government to make restitution.

Let us consider these grounds in their order.

The bill recites that the college "was destroyed without authority by disorderly soldiers of the United States during the late war."

In other words, it is claimed that this property was destroyed by the wrongful and tortious act of the United States soldiers.

No case can be found where a sovereign or a government has ever been held liable for the torts of its officers even, let alone its humbler servants.

That the Government is not liable for the torts of its officers or agents has been repeatedly held by the Supreme Court of the United States. I quote from the syllabi of a case decided in 1868:

The Government is not liable on an implied assumpsit for the torts of its officers committed while in its service, and apparently for its benefit.

To admit such liability would involve the Government in all its operations in embarrassments, losses, and difficulties subversive of the public interest.—8 Wallace, 269.

Also, from the opinion of Justice Miller in the same case:

But it is not to be disguised that this case is an attempt, under the assumption of an implied contract, to make the Government responsible for the unauthorized acts of its officers, those acts being in themselves torts. No government has ever held itself liable to individuals for the misfeasance, laches, or unauthorized exercise of power by its officers and agents.

In the language of Judge Story, it does not undertake to guarantee to any person the fidelity of any of the officers or agents whom it employs, since that would involve it in all operations in endless embarrassments, and difficulties, and losses, which would be subversive of the public interest.

And further from the same opinion:

In a few adjudged cases where the United States was plaintiff, the defendants have been permitted to assert demands of various kinds by way of set-off, and these cases may afford useful guidance where they are in point. The cases of this class establish the principle that even in regard to matters connected with the cause of action relied on by the United States the Government is not responsible for the laches, however gross, of its officers.

The language of the statutes which confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims excludes by the strongest implication demands against the Government founded on torts. The general principle which we have already stated as applicable to all governments forbids, on a policy imposed by necessity, that they should hold themselves liable for unauthorized wrongs inflicted by their officers on the citizen, though occurring while engaged in the discharge of official duties.

It was sought in the case just cited to hold the Government liable to loyal parties because of the tort of a quartermaster. The books abound in cases to the same effect: United States vs. Kirkpatrick, 9 Wheat., 720; Dox vs. Paymaster-General, 1 Peters, 318; Connell vs. Voorhees, 13 Ohio, 523; Nichols vs. The United States, 7 Wall. 122; Flushing Ferry Co. case, 6 Ct. of Cl. 1.

If, for torts committed by high officers the Government is not liable, much less will it be liable for the unauthorized acts of private soldiers. The maxim respondeat superior does not apply between the General Government and its agents who are guilty of torts. I am not, however, satisfied that this college was burned by Union soldiers. There was no reason why they should do so. There were Army stores in the building. The United States forces expected to permanently occupy it. The confederates had just been driven from it. The Union officers would have protected it if only to save the stores. It is more probable that confederate soldiers fired it, on their retreat, to destroy the stores in it, and to prevent its further occupancy by Union troops, &c. In a report made by Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, to the House of Representatives, November 19, 1792, he stated the laws and usages of nations in relation to the payment of certain claims thus:

That according to the laws and usages of nations a State is not obliged to make compensation for damages done to its citizens by an enemy, or wantonly or unauthorized by its troops.

This rule is based upon sound principles and authority, and has borne the test of time.

It will be remembered that by the twelfth article of the treaty of May 8, 1871, a commission upon the claims of Her Britannic Majesty against the United States, and of the citizens of the United States against Great Britain, was constituted.

Count Louis Corti, of Italy, was made president of that commission. Right Honorable Russell Gurney, member of Parliament, member of Her Majesty's privy council and recorder of London, was appointed commissioner on behalf of Great Britain. Hon. James S. Frazer, formerly justice of the supreme court of the State of Indiana, was the commissioner for the United States.

This commission began its session in Washington in September, 1871, and during its two years' sessions passed upon four hundred and ninety-seven claims, involving war claims of every conceivable character. Counsel of the highest talent and ability appeared before it. The most of the claims filed were of British subjects residing or owning property in the United States for damages caused by the Union Army. That commission uniformly and by unanimous vote disallowed all claims against the United States for unauthorized destruction of property by soldiers, and even when works of art were involved.

I read a paragraph or two from the report of Robert S. Hale, esq., the agent on the part of the United States, to Secretary Fish, of date of November 30, 1873, and from page 50 of volume 3 Foreign Relations United States:

In several cases there were allegations of the wanton destruction of property by United States troops, and in some cases satisfactory proof was made of the fact of such destruction by soldiers without command or authority of their commanding officers and in defiance of orders.

In the case of Anthony Barclay (No. 5) allegations were made of wanton destruction of property, including valuable furniture, china, pictures, and other works of art, books, &c. The proof was conflicting as to whether the injuries alleged were committed by soldiers or not, but if committed by soldiers it was plainly not only without authority but in direct violation of the order of General Sherman. In the award made in favor of Mr. Barclay nothing was included for property alleged to have been destroyed.

Several claims were brought for property alleged to have been destroyed by the burning of Columbia on the allegation that the city was wantonly fired by the army of General Sherman, either under his orders or with his consent and permission. A large amount of testimony was taken upon this subject, including that of General Hampton and other confederate officers on the part of the claimants, and of Generals Sherman, Logan, Howard, Woods, and other Federal officers on the part of the United States. The claims were all disallowed, all the commissioners agreeing.

Thus it appears that even the commissioner on the part of the British government did not even claim that the United States were liable for the tortious acts of their unauthorized agents, though conceded to be liable for the necessary destruction of property of British subjects as incident to the war.

We come now to the question of the liability of the Government for the alleged reason that it took possession of the college for its own purposes, excluding the owners, &c.

The fact is, when the war came the owners, or rather the custodians of the college, its president and faculty, abandoned it and joined the insurgent army.

When this college was taken possession of by the United States forces it had been abandoned as a college, and was being used as barracks, &c., by the confederate forces. (Report, 1872, Globe, volume 88, page 939.) Finding it abandoned, the officers had a right to occupy it. It was in a hostile country that had to be held and occupied by Union forces.

It is further said that it was within territory excepted from Lincoln's emancipation proclamation.

This exception was not because it was in loyal territory, but because it was, on January 1, 1863, held and occupied permanently by loyal forces and was within the Union lines. (It is not certain that the territory occupied by the college was excepted from the operation of the proclamation.)

By the custom, rules, and laws of war, unoccupied public buildings, of whatever character, are to be used for public purposes, such as shelter for stores and material of war, hospitals, &c., in preference to driving inhabitants from their dwellings.

Being rightfully, under an appropriation to military use, in possession of the Union army, (for if wrongfully in possession of that army, then, as has been shown, no liability whatever attaches,) does it follow that its destruction raises an obligation to pay for it?

It is expressly held that the Government is not liable for the burning of a building which it has seized for its use. (Lagow's case, 10 Court of Claims, 266; Green's case, 10 Court of Claims, 466.)

In Lagow's case the court say in the syllabus:

The Government is not liable for the burning of a building which it has seized and used as a small-pox hospital, and it is immaterial whether it has given up possession or whether it remains constructively in possession.

To the same effect is Filor's case, 9 Wall., 45.

By the law of nations it is said that property of institutions of learning should be preserved and protected.

Grant this to be true, and it doubtless is true, yet it does not follow that in case of the willful destruction of such an institution by a conquering army that any legal or moral obligation arises as against the government to which that army belongs to pay for such destruction.

The committee have labored in vain to find instances or precedents for such an obligation. Not one has been found. None are given in the report and none are referred to in the speeches made during this or any preceding Congress. None exist.

Let us give attention to the cases cited in the report. It is said Washington made the trustees of Princeton College a present of fifty guineas as restitution for damage it sustained from the fire of the Americans at the battle of Princeton, and that after the close of the war Louis XVI, the ally of America, caused the college buildings in the United States accidentally destroyed by the fire of his troops to be replaced and every injury to be repaired. These are the only instances found where restitution has been made for an injury to an institution of learning. Both of these were in the nature of a gratuity to loyal institutions within friendly territory. In neither case was any legal liability as against a sovereign government admitted or recognized, but the contrary. As precedents, these two instances are against the legal liability of the Government in any such case.

The committee also say:

In the bloodiest and angriest civil strifes England has respected her schools and colleges.

Grant this to be true, and it may truthfully be said that the United States to a remarkable extent "has respected her schools and colleges." The accidental or wanton destruction in the furnace of war of a school or college building under loyal or disloyal control raises no obligation on the part of the Government to pay for it. There are, it is true, some legislative precedents for reimbursing institutions of learning for damages caused by ravages of war. And here I adopt the language of Senator Sumner in a speech made January 12, 1869, in the Senate. (71 Globe, 301.)

From the beginning of our national life Congress has been called to deal with claims for losses by war. Though new in form the present case belongs to a long list whose beginning is hidden in revolutionary history. The folio of state papers now before me entitled "Claims" attest the number and variety. Even amid the struggles of the war, as early as 1779, Rev. Dr. Witherspoon was allowed $19,040 for repairs of the college at Princeton, damaged by troops. There was afterward a similar allowance to the academy at Wilmington, in Delaware, and also to the college in Rhode Island. These latter were recommended by Mr. Hamilton, while Secretary of the Treasury, as "affecting the interest of literature." On this account they were treated as exceptional. It will also be observed that they concerned claimants within our own jurisdiction.

These claims were paid in the interest of literature alone, and the institutions were at all times loyal to the Government. I do not deny but that it is a paramount duty of an army to protect colleges, school-houses, churches, works of art, &c., belonging to the enemy. But it does not follow that in case such property is destroyed or injured that payment therefor must be made.

There is probably no instance where such property held or owned by an enemy has ever been paid for, though destroyed in violation of the usages of war. As a matter of discipline and wise policy, as well as humanity toward citizens of the country through which an army is being marched the commanding general very often insists upon paying for all supplies taken for consumption by the army. The most rigid orders are often issued and enforced to prevent marauding upon the inhabitants.

The Duke of Wellington when he entered France with his victorious army from Spain, in pursuit of Marshal Soult in 1814, near the close of the final struggle of the Emperor Napoleon, punished pillage and foraging upon the French people with death, to preserve the perfect discipline of his army; and he required his officers to pay for all supplies taken from the country. But no rule of international law ever required a nation to pay for property of any kind belonging to the enemy taken or destroyed in violation of orders.

The committee quote in its report parts of paragraphs 34 to 36, section 2, of General Orders No. 100, giving instuctions to the armies of the United States in the field. (This order was prepared by Dr. Leiber and approved by President Lincoln.) These paragraphs do not deny the right to take and use for military purposes colleges and other public buildings. Paragraph 34 expressly recognizes the right to seize universities, churches, &c., and it also asserts that they "may be taxed or used when the public service may require it."

The last clause of paragraph 37 (not quoted in the report) is as follows:

This rule does not interfere with the right of the victorious invader to tax the people or their property, to levy forced loans, to billet soldiers, or to appropriate property, especially houses, land, boats, or ships, and churches, for temporary and military uses.

Halleck on the laws of war says:

War * * * makes legal enemies of all the individual members of the hostile states; * * * it also extends to property, and gives to one belligerent the right to deprive the other of everything which might add to his strength and enable him to carry on hostilities.

The people in the late war were divided territorially.

Our own Supreme Court has given us the rule of international law applied directly to our civil war. I quote from the famous prize cases:

All persons residing within this territory, whose property may be used to increase the revenues of the hostile power, are in this contest liable to be treated as enemies, though not foreigners.—2 Black., 636.

See to same effect Alexandria cotton case, 2 Wall., 404.
